PREFACE

Saint Sayyid Shāh Kalimullāh Husainī alias Akbar Shāh and Bade Sāhib, a scholar, linguist, philosopher, poet and versatile genius who died young, flourished in Hyderabad City during the later half of 17th Century A D. Due to passage of time and general slackness of interest in academic pursuits, he was totally forgotten. So much so, that today it is hardly possible to get any information about him in the city where he lived and died. Thanks to the indefatigable efforts and scholarly zeal of my friend Dr. Raghavan, Head of the Sanskrit Dept, Madras University, the Sanskrit version of his valuable work on an aspect of the rhetoric of love called Śrngāramañjarī is now being presented to the scholarly world for the first time. It is based on two manuscripts discovered by him at intervals, one in the Government Oriental Library, Mysore, and the other in the Maharajah Serfojī Sarasvatī Mahal library, Tanjore. Excepting for a few references in the prologue of this book, the life of the author is shrouded in mystery. The veil is partly lifted through the generous help of one of his descendants Hazrat Sayyid Shāh Haider Husainī, present Sajjādā of Shāh Rājū's Tomb near Hyderabad, and bearer of the spiritual torch that has been kept aflame by the family for about six hundred years in the Deccan. He has kindly pointed out to me the unpretentious and modest tomb of Bade Sāhib (Plate A) which is situated to the South-east of his father's magnificent mausoleum (Plate B) in the open courtyard.

Here it may be added that each Qutb Shāhī king vied with his predecessor in building a more dignified mausoleum for himself. Tānā Shāh was an exception to this. There is no evidence of his having embarked on such an enterprise. The incomplete mausoleum at Golconda, wrongly said to have been built by Tānā Shāh for himself, has been cleared of debris. It has revealed a sarcophagus in the middle bearing the name of Nizāmuddīn, brother-in-law and rival of Tānā Shāh for throne, who died during the latter's reign. Hence, it is obvious that this tomb was not being built for Tānā Shāh. But he did build his preceptor Shāh Rājū's tomb mentioned above, which though in need of finishing touches here and there, is loftier and more impressive than any of the tombs of the Qutb Shāhī Kings.

Hazrat Haider Husainī Sāhib also lent me for a few days life time miniature paintings of the author and his reverend father, together with two Sanads, one granted by Abul Hasan Tānā Shāh and the other confirming the first Sanad, by Aurangzeb. This valuable material has directly and indirectly thrown much light on the life of the author.

The paintings that were lent to me are very good specimens of late Seventeenth Century Deccan art. The portrait of saint Akbar Shāh (Plate C) represents him as a handsome person in the flush of youth wearing a costly turban with a 'turra' used mostly by royalty, dressed in a gold embroidered coat with beautiful rose flower and leaf designs upon it in red and green, holding a delicate flower in his hand and all showing the high social status he might have been enjoying. The inscription in the right hand top corner, reads Hazrat Janāb Sayyid Shāh Kalīmullāh Husainī Qaddasa Allāhu Sırrahū. The last words qaddasa Allāhu sırrahū' mean 'May God make his spiritual abode celestial' and establish that the painting might have been finished after the saint's demise. The portrait of his father Hazrat Shāh Rājū (Plate c) is also a very good specimen of late 17th Century Deccan art and fortunately it preserves the name of the artist as Rahīm Khān.

The Sanad granted by Abul Hasan Tānā Shāh is dated in 1086 A. H. (1675 A. D.) i.e. within two or three years of his accession to throne. It is remarkable for its illumination and records the grant of several villages to Hazrat Shāh Rājū and his family. But out of respect for the saint it is in the name of one of his sons Hazrat Sayyid Husain alias Shāh Sāhib. As it is not in the name of his eldest son Bade Sāhib it is to be presumed that he might not have been alive at that time, and must have expired in or earlier than 1086 A. H. (1675 A. D.)

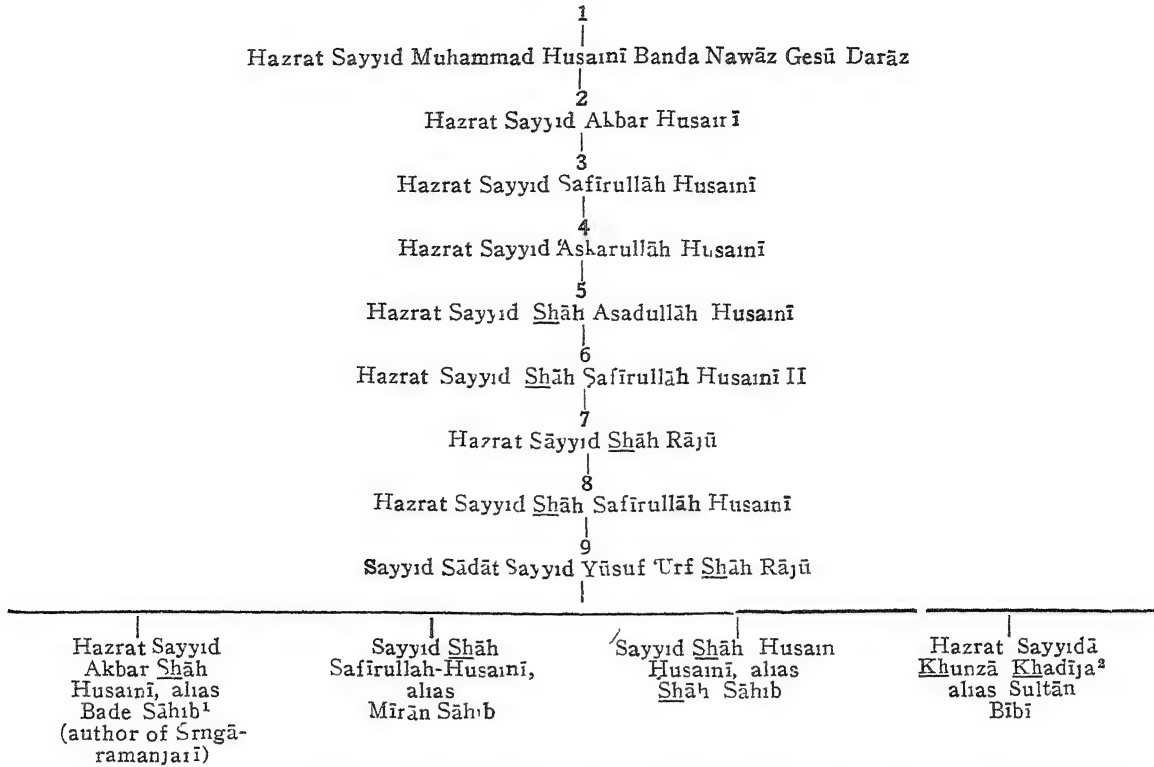

The Sanad granted by Aurangzeb (Plate D) is dated in 1105 A. H. (1693 A. D.). It also does not make any mention of Bade Sāhib. No reliable evidence regarding the dates of birth and death of Bade Sāhib is forthcoming. However, the internal evidence of the book and material supplied by Hazrat Haidar Husainī Sāhib throw enough light on these problems. From the prologue to the Śrngāramañjarī it appears that the author was a friend of Abul Hasan and had also studied with him. Therefore, he must have been born in or about the same year as Abul Hasan i.e. 1056 A. H.¹ (1646 A. D.). The prologue is also clear on the point that when the book was being translated from Telugu into Sanskrit Bade Sāhib was alive and that Tānā Shāh, who ascended the throne in 1083 A. H. (1672 A. D.), was the ruling king. The above referred to Sanad of Tānā Shāh granted in 1086 A. H. (1675 A. D.) implies that Bade Sāhib was dead by that time. Consequently, his death must have occurred somewhere between 1083 and 1086 A. H. Thus he was hardly 30 years of age at the time of his death and during this short span of life his book Śrngāramañjarī was produced in Telugu and translated in Sanskrit.

In contrast to the above it will not be out of place to mention here the present day general apathy of the muslims of India towards Sanskrit and regional languages. The Khalifs of Baghdād had arranged for the translation of several Sanskrit books into Arabic and scholars like Alberuni had specialised in the study of Sanskrit. In the Deccan itself there are several instances of muslims having evinced keen interest in regional languages. Some of them have been referred to by Dr. Raghavan, in his Introduction to this book. Among them Saint Akbar Shāh holds a glorious position and it is hoped that the publication of his Śrngāramañjarī will be a land mark in making the cultural ties stronger and in inducing people to attain proficiency in each others' languages.

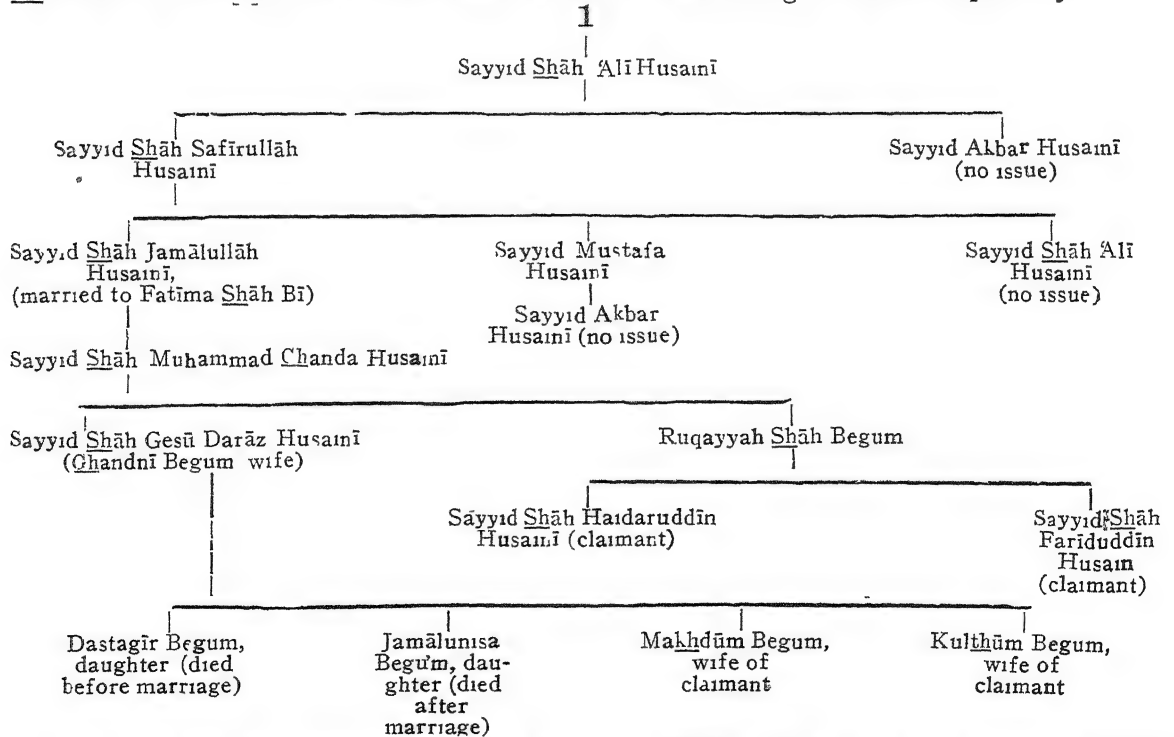

I am giving, below the geneology of Bade Sāhib as secured from the archives of Shaikh-kā-Rauzā, Gulbarga, which are in the charge of the Sajjādā Sāhib of that tomb. I believe that this is more correct at least so far as the spellings of the names are concerned.

1 The correct date of Abdul Hasan's birth is not recorded. But it is generally believed that he was twenty-eight years old when he ascended the throne in 1083 A. H. (1672 A. D.) Therefore 1056 A. H. (1646 A. D.) may be taken as tentative date of his birth.

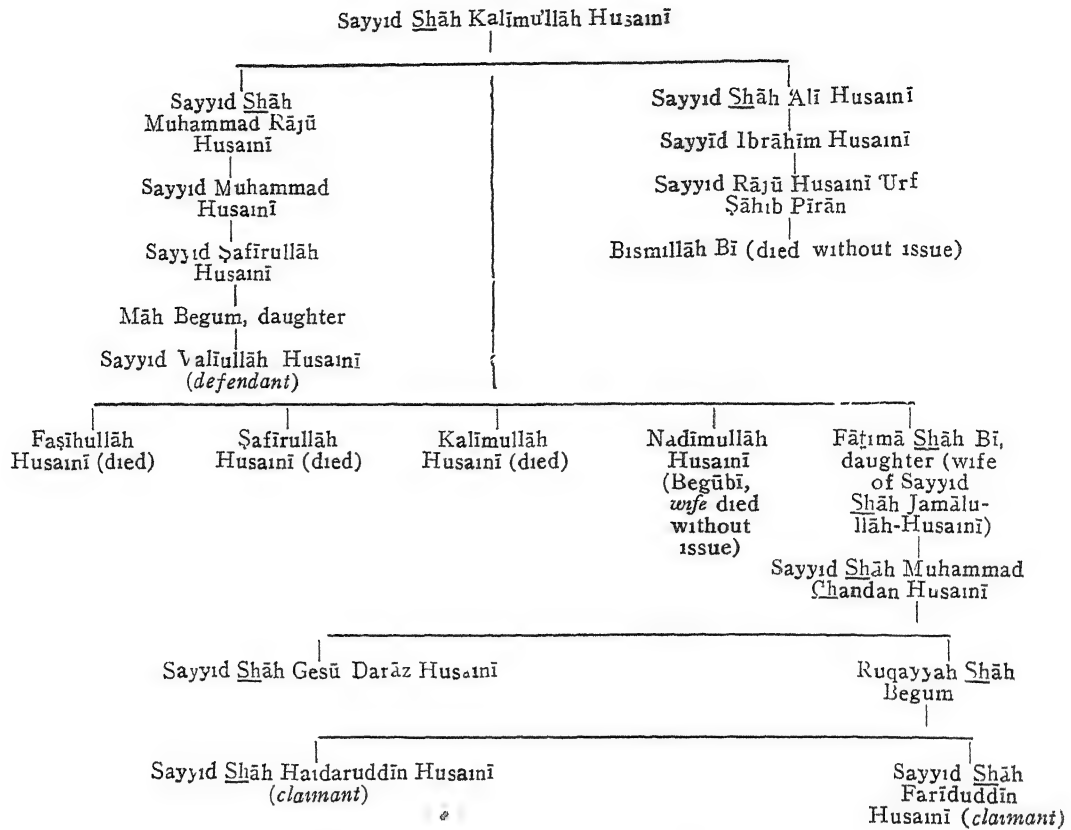

Much information regarding the issues of Bade Sāhib is not available, but in the course of a judgment dated 10th Shaban 1357 A H in case No 80, Sayyid Valiullah Husainī, Appellant versus Sayyid Shāh Haider Husainī, Respondent, it has been shown that Bade Sāhib (Sayyid Muhammad Akbar Husainī) had a son Sayyid Shāh Safirullāh Husainī, who had two sons, namely (1) Sayyid Shāh Alī Husainī and (2) Sayyid Shāh Kalimullāh Husainī. The issues of each of them are given below separately —

1 So far as I have ascertained his name was Sayyid Kalimullāh Husainī and he was popularly called Akbar Shāh and Bade Sāhib

2 The endorsement made on the reverse of Abul Hasan's Sanad by Aurangzeb's officers mentions Sultān Bibi as Shāh Rājū's daughter. It is to be presumed that this might have been the popular name of Sayyidā Khunzā Khadija, therefore, I have added it here

A glance at the English Introduction and the edited text of the book will immediately reveal the high academic merits of Dr. Raghavan. He has tackled each aspect of the subject in a masterly way. The editing of the text, the comparative study of the subject as treated by innumerable exponents, the addition of footnotes, all required profound knowledge and unabated zeal. Both the qualities are possessed by him in great abundance, and scholars shall ever remain grateful to him for his devotion to the task. I am immensely grateful to Hyderabad State for approving of my proposal regarding the publication of this book in the Departmental series. My special thanks are due to the veteran educationist Mr. Sajjad Mirza, Secretary to Government in the Archaeological Department, who has always lent full support to all the progressive schemes submitted by me.

INTRODUCTION

I

While pursuing my interest in the literary products of the healthy cultural interaction of Sanskrit and the Muslim patrons and authors, I happened to find in the Catalogue of the Government Oriental Library, Mysore (Supplemental Catalogue, 1928, p. 14, No C. 2096) the entry Śrngāramañjarī, Badā Akbar. The names of the work and its Muslim author excited my curiosity and led me to an examination of the contents of the manuscript. Sri H. R. Rangaswami Ayyangar, Curator of the Library, was kind enough not only to send first some extracts from the manuscript, but to supply later a complete transcript of the manuscript for my use.

In the same year (1943), in the middle of December¹, a paper of mine on the Śrngāramañjarī by Akbar Shah, a Muslim saint of Hyderabad, was read before the first session of the Hyderabad Telugu Academy, and the appreciation and interest evinced by the then Education Member of H. E. H. the Nizam's Government, Dr. Nawab Mehdi Yar Jung Bahadur, who sent for a copy of my paper, led to the enthusiastic proposal of the Hyderabad Telugu Academy that they would publish this work under their own auspices; but this idea did not take shape.

To draw the attention of the wider scholarly world to this interesting work, I published an account of it and the Muslim author to whom it is ascribed in the Dr. C. Kunhan Raja Presentation Volume² (pp 325-335) in 1946. The twelfth session of the All-India Oriental Conference at Nagpur, in the October of the same year, registered a favourable turn in my efforts to bring out this work, it was here that I proposed to Mr. Khwaja Muhammad Ahmad, Curator of the Museum and Director, Archaeological Department, Hyderabad, Deccan, that the publication of my edition of the Śrngāramañjarī through the Hyderabad Archaeological Department would be appropriate in view of its Muslim author's association with Gulburga and Hyderabad. Dr. Mr. Khwaja Muhammad Ahmad welcomed the proposal and began making arrangements for its finalisation.

While his arrangements were under negotiation, and political developments were causing a temporary interruption, I was fortunate to discover in the Maharajah Serfoji Sarasvati Mahal Library, Tanjore, a second manuscript of this Śrngāramañjarī, and obtained a transcript of it. The manuscript is described under No. 11001 in Vol. XVI of the new Descriptive Catalogue of the Sarasvati Mahal Library (old Burnell Catalogue No. 10556). While the Mysore manuscript is in paper and Devanagari script, the Tanjore manuscript is in palm-leaf and Telugu script, and while the former is complete, the latter lacks the beginning, it does not have the first sixteen introductory verses and the long prose passage devoted to a description of the author and his genealogy, and begins straight with the enumeration of the earlier authoritative works which it has used. A noteworthy point regarding the Tanjore manuscript is that it appears to mention its author as Shahaji, son of Ekoji, the Maharatta ruler of Tanjore (A.D. 1684-1710):

येकोजिराजवरसुत साहराज सङ्ग्रह (?) शृङ्गारमञ्जरी संपूर्णम् ॥

It is from the word Ekojī onwards that the colophon here in the Tanjore manuscript becomes different from the correct one found in the Mysore manuscript, the corrupt expression 'Sāharājasamgraham' may after all refer only to king Shahajī having secured or collected the manuscript of this work, if the scribe or discoverer of this manuscript had mistaken its author as king Shahajī of Tanjore, there is some cause for such a mistake, Shah Raja, as will be seen below, is a name occurring frequently in the line of the author of the Śrngāramañjarī, Akbar Shah, and the scribe, who had before him a manuscript without the introductory verses and the prose passage describing the Muslim author to elucidate further the incomplete colophon mentioning Saharaja, must have taken king Shahajī¹ of Tanjore as the author, as the latter was certainly more familiar to him

Early in 1949, I was glad to hear from Mr Khwaja Muhammad Ahmad that the Hyderabad Government had approved of the inclusion of my edition of the Śrngāramañjarī of Akbar Shah in the publications of the Archaeological Department of Hyderabad.

II

The edition of the Śrngāramañjarī that I am presenting here is, as already stated, based on the two manuscripts of the work in the Mysore and Tanjore libraries. The Tanjore manuscript proved highly useful, as I could correct many a slip in the Mysore manuscript with its help. Compared to the Mysore manuscript, it has many gaps, but it is only in a single context towards the end of the work that there is an unfortunate gap in both the manuscripts which could not be made up by any means. Generally the headings in the Tanjore manuscript are in a longer and more precise form. In the text that I have presented here, the rejected readings of the two manuscripts, whether corrupt or not, are recorded in the foot-notes, I have reconstructed the text or suggested emendations at places where both the manuscripts were corrupt, and lines where even this could not be done are only a few

In the foot-notes, besides the readings, I have given here and there some other notes also. On a work of such an attractive theme I would have loved to write my own Sanskrit commentary, but exigencies of time, cost of printing etc., forced me to renounce that pleasure. I have therefore added in the foot-notes short explanatory notes, in Sanskrit or English, on the meaning of a few passages whose drift is rather obscure. The Śrngāramañjarī is closely related to two previous works, the Rasamañjarī of Bhānudatta, and a commentary on it called the Āmoda, it generally criticises the Rasamañjarī and adopts many of the views expressed in the Āmoda, while the former is printed and well known, the latter is still in manuscript and its views are not known at all, therefore, wherever the Āmoda is referred to in the Śrngāramañjarī I have, for the greater understanding of the text, given in a series of separate foot-notes the relevant portions of the Āmoda, together with necessary critical remarks, from the Adyar Library manuscript of that work. Wherever possible I have identified the quotations in the Śrngāramañjarī, and references to these sources too, I have included in the foot-notes.

III

THE AUTHOR

The Śrngāramañjarī is not silent about its author. After paying respect to Hindu divinities and the preceptor (guru) in the first two verses, the work proceeds to give an account of the author in a series of verses, 3-16, followed up by a prose passage. In verse 3, Bande Nawaz Hazarat (Bande Navāja Hajaratī) is saluted in verse 4, the genealogy of the author is begun, in the family of Bande Nawaz Hazarat appeared Shāh Rāja (Sāharāja), verse 5 says that this Shāh Rāja had three sons, Shāh Rāja, Shah-nafezarullah, and Akbar Shāh, from the second of the three brothers, was born Shāh Rāja, described as preceptor to the King (verse 6). This Shāh Rāja had a son named Akbar Shāh, otherwise known as Bade Sāheb (verse 7), the next verse further extols the greatness of Akbar Shāh, mentioned here as Safai Bade Saheb, verse 9 praises this Bade Saheb's knowledge, piety, eminence and fame; in verses 10 and 11, two younger brothers of this Bade Saheb, Akbar Shah, are mentioned, Mir Saheb and Shah Saheb, two more verses extol again the eldest brother Bade Saheb Akbar, the first referring to his intelligence, learning and high position, and the second trying to explain etymologically that his name Akbar (A-ka-vara) means that not even the divinities Viṣṇu and Brahmā are his superiors.

This Akbar Shah was a patron of poets (verse 14) This Akbar, who was respected by the king, himself (svayam) wrote in Telugu, the work called Śrngāramañjarī (verse 15), and this is its Sanskrit version (verse 16)

In the above verses, more than once, reference is made to Akbar Shah and his father Shāh Rāja being the respected guru of the king. The important information of the name of this king is given in the prose passage which now follows. The whole passage, which further eulogises the philosophical, literary, musical and other artistic endowments of the author Bāde Sāheb Akbar Shāh, mentions this king at the beginning, a Sultan Abul Hasan

I proceed now to identify the author, his revered ancestor, and his royal patron Bande Nawaz Hazrat who is saluted in verse 3 is the renowned Muslim saint Gesu Daraz of Gulbarga. According to the Hadiquat-ul-Alam, Aurangzeb, during his march against the last Qutb Shahi king Abul Hasan alias Tana Shah, paid a visit to the tomb of "Hazarat Sayad Bande Nawaz Muhammad Gaisu-Daraza" at Gulbarga¹ (on 6-12-1680)², and distributed Rs 20,000 to the devotees and disciples there. Fortunately, we have ample materials bearing on the life of this Muslim saint. "This famous Muslim saint was born at Dilli (Delhi) on the 4th Rajab, A. H. 721 (30th July A.D. 1321). His proper name is Sadr-ud-Din Muhammad Hussaini, but he was commonly called Muhammad Gesu Daraz, on account of his having long ringlets. He was a disciple of Sheikh Nasir-ud-Din Chiragh of Dilli who sent him to the Dakhan in A. H. 802 (A.D. 1399) during the reign of the Sultan Firuz Bahmani. The latter received him with much honour and respect, but afterwards quarrelled with him, and to this disagreement with the saint the author of the Burhan-i-Ma'asir attributes the subsequent misfortunes of Sultan Firuz.¹ According to Ferishtah, the Sultan favoured Gisu Daraz as the supreme saint in the place of the previously favoured family of Shekh Sirajuddin, granted to him many towns, villages and lands near Kulbargah, together with a college and a monastery, the people of Deccan revered Gisu Daraz as even greater than the Prophet.² The Oriental Biographical Dictionary of Thomas William Beale³ gives some more information about Gisu Daraz. Beale says that the saint is said to be the author of several works among which are the "Adab al Murid", the "Wajadul-Ashikim", containing the whole duty of a Sufi disciple etc., and also a work of fables in Persian entitled "Asmar-ul-Asrar". He was buried at Hasanabad commonly called Kulbarga.⁴ Of his descendants Beale says that "during the reigns of the Dakhin Sultans, great sums of money were occasionally offered to his (Gisu Daraz's) descendants who reposed near the saint, in vow and presents". Beale mentions also the son of Gisu Daraz who was known as Muhammad Akbar and was the author of the "Akaed Akbari" containing the principles of the Muhammadan faith. According to the Taskire-auliya-i-Hind, I am told,⁵ the father of Gisu Daraz was known as Shah Raja, and that the grandson of Gisu Daraz was known as Mir Sadidullah.

The Hadiquat-ul-Alam also says in connection with the death and burial of Sultan Abul Hasan at Daulatabad near the tomb of the father of Gisu Daraz that Syed Raju Qattal was the name of the father of Gisu Daraz.⁶ From the genealogy given in our Srngaramañjari, we may see these names Shāhrāja, Akbar and Mīr recurring in the family.

Mention has been made of Gisu Daraz by Prof. H. K. Sherwani of the Osmania University, Hyderabad, in his article entitled "Taju'd-din Firoz and Synthesis of Bhamani Culture," in the New Indian Antiquary, Vol. VI, No. 4, pp. 75-89. According to Mr. Sherwani, Gisu Daraz's father was Sved Yusuf who had visited Deccan during the time of Muhammad Tughlaq and had breathed his last at Khuldabad on 12-7-1331 A.D. Gisu Daraz was born at Delhi on 10-7-1321, but was "eighty lunar years old" when he arrived at Gulbarga with a host of disciples. The first impression of the saint and the regard which Firoz had for him did not last.⁷ Gisu Daraz died on 1-11-1422.⁸ Both Hindus and Muslims revered Gisu Daraz and his tomb which was built by the successor of Firoz, Ahmad Shah I, Bhamani, who "perhaps knew the spiritual and moral influence" of the saint and "was not slow to take full advantage of it" (p. 87).

⁷ On the details of this estrangement between the king and the saint, see Mr. Sherwani's article, p. 87.

From the above accounts and the list supplied in the Śrngāramañjarī we may draw up the following genealogy.

According to the Tarikh Qutb Shahi by Qadri Khan munshi, of Bidar, published in Matbai Burhania, Hyderabad-Deccan, 1306 H, p. 47, extract from which was kindly supplied to me by Mr Khwaja Muhammad Ahmad, the genealogy of Shah Raju, the father of our author and the preceptor of Abul Hasan, upto Gesu Daraz is as follows: Gesu Daraz, son Muhammad Akbar son Safirulla (Dakan) son Askarulla son Asadulla son Shah Raju (of Bijapur, brother of Hussain Shah Wali), son Safirulla, son Asadulla son Shah Raju

Now the king of whom our author Akbar Shah's father Shāh Rāja is described as guru is mentioned as Sultan Abul Hasan. In the text introducing him, he is described as a scholar of great culture and accomplishment in arts. This is in all likelihood none else than Abul Hasan Qutb Shah of Golconda, known as Tana Shah as a result of his gaiety (April 21st 1672-1687 A.D.) who was the last Qutb Shahi king, was made captive by Aurangzeb on 21st Sept, 1687, and died in 1704 A.D.¹ Between A.D. 1350 and 1650, i.e., between Gesu Daraz and Akbar Shah, time has elapsed for nearly twelve generations. The names of all the members of this family and the part which this family played in the political and cultural events of Deccan deserve to be brought to light by the historians and litterateurs of Hyderabad and Deccan.

An independent corroboration of the relationship between Sultan Abul Hasan and the saints of Gesu Daraz family at Gulbarga and of the king being the pupil of Shah Raju is furnished by the work Hadiquat-ul-Alam, available in an English translation in the publication "Golkondyaci Qutbshahi" of the Bharata Itihasa Samsodaka Mandal, Poona. This work states twice that Abul Hasan was staying at the tomb of Gesu Daraz in his youth and was a student of a descendant of Gesu Daraz, Shah Raju, who happens to be the father of our author Akbar Shah, as mentioned in the genealogical list in the Śrngāramañjarī The Hadīquat-ul-Alam says in connection with the marriage of Abul Hasan ¹ 'It was resolved that the bride (daughter of Abdullah Qutbshah) should be given in marriage to Abul Hasan who was a near relative from the side of the king's mother As destined by God, the very night when the hour of marriage was fixed, Abul Hasan was sent for He was then taken to the bathroom, diessed . and the princess was at last given over to him. It is related that Abul Hasan was residing for fourteen years previous to his marriage at the Takriyeh of his Murshid Sayid Shah Raju, who was one of the revered grandchildren² of His Holiness Sayyad Muhammad Gaizu Daraz and was a worthy successor to his great predecessor It was from this Takriyeh that Abul Hasan was taken in pomp to the bathroom and was decorated in the bridegroom's dress for the marriage with the princess" The book goes on to narrate how Sayyad Shah Raju foresaw this coming event on the day previous when Abul Hasan came to him to pay the usual respects to his teacher ³ The same source says later in connection with the death of Abul Hasan

He (the Quladar of the Daulatabad fort) buried him (Abul Hasan) near the grave of Syed Raju Qattal (revered father of Syed Muhammad Gaizu Daraz) adjacent to the mausoleum The date of his death has not been mentioned in any of the existing books on history or biography. But because it is told that he passed fourteen years of his life in childhood, and fourteen years in study as a disciple of his spiritual preceptor Syed Shah Raju, and afterwards ruled for fourteen years, passed a further period of fourteen years in captivity, it can be said that he died in 1111 H or 1112 H (1700 A D) "

This account confirms the information in our Śrngāramañjarī that our author Akbar Shah's father was called Shah Raja, and that Abul Hasan was a student under that Shah Raja, our author's father The king was thus a friend and co-student of our author himself It is but fitting that one who had spent his youth at the tomb of Gesu Daraz should pass away at Daulatabad and get buried by the side of the tomb of Syed Raja, father of Gesu Daraz.

In two verses in the beginning (15, 16), already quoted, this Sanskrit Śrngāramañjarī is stated to be a translation of a Telugu work of that name by Akbar Shah himself. A second reference to this Telugu original and to the illustrative Telugu verse of old occurring in it are made in the course of the Sanskrit version On p 13, in the section on Sāmānyā Nāyikā, the work speaks of the Telugu illustrative verse in the original

प्राचीनान्ध्रभाषोदाहरणादप्ययमर्थः सिद्धः, तस्यार्थो लिख्यते ।

The work no doubt expressly mentions the literary gifts of Akbar Shah, and says that he himself (svayam) wrote it ; but a legitimate doubt may be raised whether the Muslim Saint Akbar Shah wrote this work on love⁴ in Telugu and Sanskrit The doubt may be strengthened by the fact that one of the introductory verses here (no 14), as also the prose passage quoted above, refers to Akbar Shah as a patron of poets, and in the course of the work Akbar himself is eulogised in illustration as the Nāyaka on pp 9 (verse 49), 11 (verse 62), 21 (verses 108-9), 49 (verse 281), 50 (verse 284) and 52 (verse 298) It may be that at the instance of Akbar, some Telugu scholar wrote the original Śrngāramañjarī in Telugu and then a Sanskrit scholar translated it into Sanskrit Obeisance to the Hindu divinities in the first stanza will be appropriate in that case The subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās had been made popular among Muslim patrons and authors by a number of Hindī works dealing with it and while on one hand the use of a number of Alankāra works of the Telugu country point to the association of a Telugu author with this work, the use here of Hindī works on the subject would also show that Akbar should have been not a mere passive patron, but an active collaborator in the production of this work, also the employment of a simile like the ripe whitish pan-leaf for the cheek (verse 235) speaks of an imagination accustomed to Dakṣiṇī poetry. Whether Akbar Shah was the real author or only the patron, it is all the same significant that in the Muslim courts of the Deccan, indigenous literature and art flourished. It is well known that the Qutb Shahis were great promoters of letters, both as authors¹ and patrons, and at their hands Telugu literature especially received great encouragement.²

According to the Hadīquat-ul-Alam, as pointed out before, Abul Hasan was, before he was brought to Golconda and suddenly made king, studying in the tomb of Gesu Daraz at Gulbarga, under the then descendant and guardian of the tomb of Gesu Daraz vis, Shah Raja, father of our author Akbar Shah. He was thus an associate and friend of Akbar Shah himself who must have succeeded Shah Raja as the king's spiritual preceptor after his father. The friendship must have persisted, and as Tana Shah the king given to pleasure, Abul Hasan might well have commissioned his guru's son to produce a treatise on the types of heroes and heroines figuring in love.

The great popularity of this subject among the authors and their patrons of this time and part of the country is shown also by the fact that an author on this very subject of Nāyakas and Nāyikās, the celebrated composer of Telugu Padas, Kṣetrājña, was patronised by Abdulla Qutb Shah of Golconda (A.D. 1620-72) and his general, Tupākula Kṛsnappa, in his song in Devagāndhārī rāga, Ādī tāla, Kṣetrājña says that he had a contest with one Tulasimūrti in the court of the Padshah of Golconda and that on that occasion, he composed 1,100 Padas.

Balavantudai Golakonda Pādusā bahumānamosagī
Tulasimūrtito vādu dalachu vela velayu Muvva Gopāludu veyyinnūru padamulu
naluvadi dinamulalōne nannukalasi vinupīñcenē³

It has already been remarked that the tomb of Gesu Daraz was a meeting point of adoration for both the Hindus and the Muslims. Besides, Akkanna and Madanna, the two Hindu ministers of Tana Shah, kept up a Hindu atmosphere and it is recorded that one of the pleas with which Aurangzeb was induced to punish Abul Hasan Tana Shah was that, at the instance of his two Hindu ministers, even Muhammadan courtiers of Abul Hasan were taking part in Hindu celebrations.⁴ Tradition glorifies Tana Shah with the story of Saint Ramadas of Bhadrācala, the details of which are well-known to all. Down below all its gaiety, Tana Shah's heart appears to have had a firm philosophical

According to Messrs R. Anantakrishna Sarma and Ch. Papayya Sastri, in two Telugu books of songs of 1881 and 1912 (the former earlier than the Sangita sampradāya pradarsinī (1904-5) from which I have quoted above), the lines read "Golakonda pahadusā koka-vela niñci-Tolasimūrtivāru bilicinavela-velaya Muvva Gopāludu-veyyinnūru padamulu-naluvadi-dinamulu logānanu galasi vinupīñcane."

anchor and none will fail to be struck by the spiritual dignity of his last testament, spoken by Abul Hasan on the eve of the fall of his fort and his capture by Aurangzeb. Abul Hasan said

“ My belief in God, the Glorious and the Great, the Creator of the World and the sustainer of princes and paupers, is such that He, may He be glorified, never keeps back His kind and merciful glances from his slave at any time or under any circumstance and sends him his allotted food. My paternal and maternal grandfathers passed their time always in peace and plenty and power. Yet, for some time, God willed that I should pass my days in poverty. Again, with his bounteous glance falling upon me, a humble fellow, He created for me such environments as, within only a short period of one hour, exalted me in the high position of kingship. Nobody including myself could have ever imagined that I was to be a king. He, praise be to Him, has now left no desire or yearning in my heart. I gave away lacs and spent crores. Now, He may have taken the reigns of sovereignty out of my hands as a retribution against some improper acts of mine. I must not grudge against His very kind treatment . . .”

It is therefore quite natural to suppose that some Telugu and Sanskrit poets associated with both the king and his spiritual preceptor were connected with the production of this Śrngāramañjarī in Telugu and Sanskrit.

IV

Works and Authors cited in the Śrngāramañjarī

The Telugu Śrngāramañjarī The Śrngāramañjarī, as it has already been noted, purports to be a Sanskrit version of a Telugu work of that name. Verses 15 and 16 in the introduction say ‘तेनान्ध्रभाषयाय रचितः शृङ्गारमञ्जरीग्रन्थः’ and ‘तद्विरचितान्ध्रभाषाकलिता शृङ्गारमञ्जरीच्छायाम्’ (p. 2), and in the discussion on Sāmānyā-nāyikā, reference is also made to an old Telugu illustrative verse, evidently cited in this Telugu Śrngāramañjarī प्राचीनान्ध्रभाषोदाहरणादप्ययमर्थः सिद्धः, तस्यार्थो लिख्यते । (p. 13).

It may also be noted in this connection that, among the works mentioned at the beginning as having been used by the author, a Narasa-kāvya is found, which may be, as shown below, the Telugu Alankāra work, Narasabhūpālīya of Bhattumūrti; of the Sanskrit treatises too that are referred to and quoted from, it is significant, that some are works produced and popular in the Telugu country. I have not been able to find so far in any manuscript library a copy of a Śrngāramañjarī in Telugu answering to the description given above.

At the beginning (p. 2), the Śrngāramañjarī mentions a number of earlier works as forming its basis. Rasamañjarī, Āmoda, Parimala, Śrngāratilaka, Rasikapriya, Rasārnava, Pratāparudrīya, Sundaraśingāra, Narasakāvya, Daśarūpaka, Vilāsaratnākara, Kāvya-parīksā, and Kāvya-parīkāśa. While these names are merely mentioned at the beginning, in the body of the text, the following works are quoted: the Rasamañjarī and the Āmoda frequently; Pratāparudrīya thrice (pp. 16 (anon), 19, 21); Sāhitya-ratnākara (p. 19); Bhāratiya (Nāṭya śāstra) (pp. 19, 23); Nāyakabhūṣana (p. 19), Rasikapriya (p. 37), and Vātsyāyana (pp. 54). During the discussions, reference is made many times to the older writers, Prācīnas, without specific mention of the name of any author or work. Besides, works of general importance, the Amarakośa, (pp. 21, 37) and the Pāṇinisūtras (pp. 23, 32, 33), as also illustrative verses from the Amaruka, Meghasandēśa, and Abhijñānaśākuntala (p. 33) are also quoted. Leaving these last, we shall notice here the works on poetics, dramaturgy and erotics mentioned or cited in the Śrngāramañjarī

The works and authors noted above fall into three classes those in Telugu, those in Hindi and those in Sanskrit. Of the works, which are enumerated at the beginning, only some are quoted in the body of the text. Regarding the rest, there is no indication to show how far they have been utilised by the author of the Śrngāramañjarī. While most of these works are identifiable, there are a few of them about which I have not been able to gather any information.

Narasakāvya This may be the Narasabhūpālīya in Telugu, otherwise called Kāvyalankārasangraha,¹ a work of rhetoric written by Bhattamūrti. Based completely on the Pratāparudrīyayaśobhāsana of Vidyānātha, the work eulogises in its illustrative verses the author's patron Turaganti Narasarāju, a feudatory chief and nephew of Aliya Rāmarāja (died 1565 A.D.).

While the greater possibility seems to be that it is this Telugu work that the Śrngāramañjarī is referring to, it must also be mentioned that a Sanskrit Alankāra work of the identical name, Narasabhūpālīya, is also known. Called more specifically Alankāra-muktāvalī, it was written by Vādhūla Kṛṣṇa Yajvan, in praise of another patron of the same age and name, Gobburī Nṛsiṃha, a nephew of Aliya Rāmarāja,² and a cousin of the Narasiṃha figuring in the Telugu work.

It has already been pointed out while dealing with the authorship of the work that some Hindi works are mentioned in it. Of the works first enumerated among the sources and quoted in the body of the text, two are identifiable as Hindi works, the Sundaraśrngāra and the Rasikapriya. The subject of classification of hero and heroine types in love is one that received great attention at the hands of Hindi writers in the Muslim-Rajput period. The Bhakti movement, especially that centering round Kṛṣṇa, gave a fillip to the detailed study of the sentiment of love and the different types of lovers, and the Hindi Vaiṣṇava poets composed a number of erotic poems, classifying and describing the various kinds of Nāyikās with reference to Kṛṣṇa as the Nāyaka. As we shall see later, the subject attained a further dimension and attractiveness, when the art of painting found in this a favourite theme.

The Sundaraśrngāra is the work of a Brahman named Sundaradās who was court-poet of Shah Jehan (1627-1658). In the introductory portion of the work Sundaradās eulogises Shah Jehan at Agra and gives his genealogy. Of himself, the author says that he hailed from Gwalior, and that Shah Jehan honoured him with presents and the titles, Kavirāya and Mahākavirāya. The work is dated A.D. 1631. Among the other works of Sundaradās may be mentioned a Viṣṇubhāṣā translation of the Simhāsana-dvātrimśikā and a philosophical work called Jñānasamudra.³ The Śrngāramañjarī merely mentions the Sundaraśrngāra as one of its sources.

The Rasikapriya is, unlike the Sundaraśrngāra, once quoted in the course of the discussions (p. 37), and criticised for holding a separate variety of Abhisārikā called Prema-abhisārikā. It was composed by Keśavadāsa Sanādhya Mīśra of Bundelkhand, who flourished about 1580 A.D. His original home was Tehri and he was patronised by Madhukar Shah of Urchā and his son Indrajit, the latter endowing him with twenty-one villages in Urchā. In Indrajit's court there was a gifted courtesan-poetess Parbin Rai Pātūri, whom Akbar wanted to be sent to his presence, on Indrajit failing to do this, Akbar fined him ten million rupees and poet Keśavadās went as an ambassador to Akbar's court, moved Rājā Birbal with his poetry and had the fine removed. Kesavadās wrote an Alankāra work on the ten limbs of poetry called Kavīpriyā, the Viṣṇāgītā in the name of Madhukar Shah, the Rāma-candrikā in Indrajit's name and a work on prosody called Rām-alamkrt-mañjarī. His Rasikapriyā, cited here in the Śrngāramañjarī was written in A D 1591, and its popularity is borne out by the large number of commentaries on it.¹

Of the Sanskrit works quoted, the Bhāratīya, the earliest, is the Nāṭyaśāstra of Bharata, both the quotations made from it (pp 19, 23) are reproduced from the corresponding context in the Āmoda, and, as can be seen from my footnotes on both these pages (19, 23), the citations here offer readings superior to those in the Kāvya-mālā and Kāśī editions.

Next comes the Śrngāratilaka which is certainly the work of that name written by Rudrabhatta. It is one of the early authoritative works devoting much attention to this subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās.²

The Daśarūpaka mentioned is the well-known work on dramaturgy by Dhanañjaya. The Śrngāramañjarī is likely to have used this work also largely, as together with its commentary, the Avaloka by Dhanika, it represents a text of considerable importance on the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās.

The Kāvya-prakāśa mentioned is again a well-known work. Though its author Mammata does not deal with Nāyaka-Nāyikās, his work is enumerated here because Rasa in general and certain aspects of Śrngāra, which are all dealt with by Mammata, are touched upon at the end of the Śrngāramañjarī.

The Pratāparudrīya (yaśobhūšana) is a work that the Śrngāramañjarī enumerates at the beginning and also quotes from in the body of the text. On p 16, its definition of the Vāsakasajjikā (I. 44) is anonymously quoted, on p. 19, its definition of the Virahotkanthitā (I. 45) is quoted, on p. 21, its definition of the Vipralabdhā (I. 47) is quoted. Except in the first case, the Śrngāramañjarī disapproves of the definitions given by Viḍyānātha. The Pratāparudrīya,³ it is well-known, eulogises Kākatīya Pratāparudra (died 1323 A D) and forms one of the widely used text-books on poetics and dramaturgy.

The work mentioned as Rasārnava is, no doubt, the Rasārnavasudhākara⁴ of the Recerla Śingabhūpāla, the Velama King of Āndhradeśa, (C 1400). The work deals briefly with Nāyaka-Nāyikās. Beyond mentioning it, the Śrngāramañjarī makes no quotation from it.

Like the last mentioned two works, the Sāhityaratnākara, which is once cited on p 19 along with some others, this whole series of quotations being taken from the Āmoda, is the work of a Telugu Ālankārika, Dharmasūri, C 1425 A D.⁵

A fresh Devanagari edn. of this work, popular in Andhradesa, would give it the greater vogue that it deserves.

A Vilāsarātnākara is mentioned among the source-books, but no quotation from it is made in the work itself. However in the Āmoda on the Rasamañjarī, as I have shown in a footnote on p. 17, it is found quoted as not tolerating the addition of a variety of Prositapatikā called Pravatsyatpatikā. Beyond this nothing is known of it, neither the author, nor its date. No manuscript of it has yet come to light.

Along with the Sāhityaratnākara etc., a Nāyaka-bhūṣana is cited on p. 19. As has already been pointed out, this whole series of quotations is taken from the Āmoda, and there the name of the work is found as Nāyikā-bhūṣana. As its name suggests, it seems to have exclusively dealt with the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās, but nothing is known of its author or date, nor is any manuscript of it to be found anywhere.

There is only one more work mentioned, the Kāvya-parīkṣā, of which we cannot say anything. It is not also quoted in the Āmoda, and its identity is obscure. Śrīvatsalānchana, commentator on the Kāvya-prakāśa, wrote an independent Kāvya-parīkṣā, but this work is not likely to be the one referred to in the Śrngāramañjarī, as it does not deal, in its five chapters, with either Rasa or Nāyaka-Nāyikās (See India Office Ms. nos 1188-9).

At the end, while speaking of the classification of heroes and heroines as given in treatises on erotics, Kāma śāstra, mention is made of Vātsyāyana. This is the author of the Kāmasūtras, which however does not give the classification of heroines dealt with here, Padmīnī etc. In the same context, with reference to types of hero, the name Kucamāra and Pāñcāla occur. These are two pre-Vātsyāyana writers on erotics whom Vātsyāyana refers to as authorities who specialised in particular branches of erotics. In I. 17, Vātsyāyana says that Kucamāra dealt separately with Aupanisadika, the subject to which Vātsyāyana devotes his last section, the use of aphrodisiac and other aids to attraction, enticement and enjoyment. Pāñcāla is Bābhavya, who summarised the entire subject of erotics in seven sections of one hundred and fifty chapters, Vātsyāyana's own work being a further epitome of Pāñcāla's work, after him, the elaboration of the sexual process into sixty-four acts took the name Pāñcālīkī Catuṣṣastī (I. 3. 17-18, II. 2, 1-5).

The Rasamañjarī, Parimāla and Āmoda. Of these three works which the Śrngāramañjarī mentions in the initial list of authorities, the Parimāla is not quoted anywhere in the body of the text. It is a commentary on the Rasamañjarī, written by a member of the well-known Śeṣa family of Benares, Śeṣa Cintāmaṇi, son of Śeṣa Nṛsiṃha and younger brother of the more celebrated author Śeṣa Kṛṣṇa. Besides the Rasamañjarī Parimāla mentioned here, Śeṣa Cintāmaṇi wrote a commentary on the Meghadūta, a treatise on prosody called Chandahprakāśa and a play, Rukminīharana. His brother Śeṣa Kṛṣṇa was the guru of Bhaṭṭojī Dīkṣita and was patronised by Govardhanadhārīn, Todarmal's son, a manuscript of his Sūdrācārāśiromaṇi in the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute is dated 1591 A.D. Apart from these data, we have a manuscript of Śeṣa Cintāmaṇi's own Rasamañjarī-vyākhyā, described under no. 3115 in Rajendralal Mitra's Notices, bearing the date 1553 A.D. which fixes his time¹. The Parimāla is available in a number of manuscripts² and is yet unprinted.

The Parimāla is severely handled in the commentary Āmoda which criticises its interpretation of the Rasamañjarī at every step³. The mention of the Parimāla in the

1. Dr. S.K. De (Śkt Poetics, I, p. 251) who says that Śeṣa Cintāmaṇi wrote before 1675 A.D. had evidently not noted these data.

2. For instance, in the Adyar, India Office and Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute libraries, in the last alone there are seven manuscripts of the Parimāla.

Śrngāramañjarī is secondhand, having been taken from the Āmoda, which the Śrngāramañjarī has used to a considerable extent

Of the Āmoda which the author of the Śrngāramañjarī quotes frequently and with deference and approval, we have fortunately many manuscripts ¹ It is a commentary on the Rasamañjarī, and since considerable use of it is made in the Śrngāramañjarī and it is a work in manuscript that deserves to be better known because of its intrinsic merits, it is necessary to give here information about it in some detail The author's name is found either as Guru (-rī-) jālaśāyīn or Gurujāla Rangaśāyīn. Ms no R 802 in the Madras Government Oriental Mss Library, which has some additional introductory verses in the beginning, not found in the Adyar ms, informs us in verse 4 that the author Rangaśāyī was born of Dharmasūri or Dharmācārya, that Dharmācārya was the youngest of four brothers, the three elders being Anantācārya, Varadācārya and Rangācārya, and that their father was Venkatācārya of Cīlakamaṇṇī family

The final colophon to the Āmoda, which has some gaps and corruptions in the Adyar ms, but is full and free from errors in the Madras Government Library ms. (D no 12941), is informing in some other respects

While the literary productions of the other members of this family are yet to be found out, it may be mentioned here that from a quotation in the Āmoda itself, on p 293, we learn that the author's grandfather (Venkatācārya) wrote a medical work called Nādiviveka (तदुक्तमस्मृतितामहकृतनाडीविवेके). Gurujāla that forms part of the author's name is a village in Palnad Taluq of Guntur Dist in Āndhradeśa; it is therefore likely that his real name is Rangaśāyīn, as his father and grandfather are referred to as Cīlakamaṇṇī Venkatācārya and Cīlakamaṇṇī Dharmācārya, Cīlakamaṇṇī in the East Godavari Dist. must have been their original home.

From the numerous works and authors whom Gurujālaśāyīn quotes or mentions, we can make a fair approximation to his date. As already shown, the Parimala that he frequently criticises cannot be later than 1553 Of the latest works quoted by him, the Kuvalayānanda (pp 76, 206) is by Appayya Dīksita who wrote that work for Venkatapatirāya (A D. 1585-1614), and the Manoramā, quoted on a grammatical point (p. 472), is the Praudhamanoramā of Bhattojī Dīksita who was a pupil of Śeśa Kṛṣṇa in the North and Appayya Dīksita in the South, and whose literary activity may be placed in the last quarter of the 16th century ² Gurujālaśāyīn is a Śrīvaisnava, and the Vādhūla Mahādeśika whom he mentions in the last colophon as his preceptor is the well-known Śrīvaiṣṇava teacher and author, Doddayācārya or Mahācārya of Ghatikācalam, who flourished in the 16th century, and wrote the works Candamāruta, Pārāśarīya-vijaya, Advaitavidyāvijaya, Vedāntadeśikavaibhavaṇṇaprakāśikā etc. As the Āmoda is used by the author of the Śrngāramañjarī, which was written in the time of Abul Hasan (1672-1687), we may safely place Gurujālaśāyīn in the first half of the 17th century A.D.

Besides the Rasamañjarī-āmoda, Gurujālaśāyīn composed a Śrngāralaharī which he quotes on p. 49 (नवभूषणे समीहा मदीयशृङ्गारलहरीम्) and again on p. 77. The dramatic compositions of his referred to in the colophon have not yet been known. It is more interesting to know that Gurujālaśāyīn was an eminent music composer, Vāggeyakāra-cakravartin. In one of the introductory verses at the beginning of the Āmoda, he refers to himself as Śāyī-vāggeyakāra. The mention of dance compositions, nrtya-prabandhas, among his works and the fact that he is an author interested in the study of Nāyikā-bheda lead us to the conclusion that his contribution to music took the form of Padas, most probably in Telugu, and in him, we have a rare Padakāya of the eminence of Ksetrajña himself. As pointed out already, Ksetrajña belonged to the same time and was connected with the Golconda court, where this subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās was keenly studied, discussed and debated upon. That Gurujālaśāyīn was of the same time, was a music composer, and was interested in the same subject of Nāyikās make us presume a much closer connection between him and the Golconda court than is borne out by explicit evidence. The Śrngāramañjarī composed in this milieu, while it refers to the author of the basic text Rasamañjarī in the singular number, shows a personal touch of reverence towards the author of the Āmoda whom it always refers to as Āmodakārāḥ in plural, this would go only to strengthen our suggestion of an intimate connection that all these authors and their works had through the Golconda court.

The Rasamañjarī which is regularly criticised in the Śrngāramañjarī is the well-known work of Bhānudatta or Bhānukara or Bhānu Pandita. The most popular and standard work on the subject, it has been much commented upon and also translated and adapted into vernaculars. Bhānudatta's time is fairly clear and his works are quite familiar to scholars, though there has been some controversy on the identification of Bhānudatta and Bhānukara and of the kings eulogised in his verses¹. In verse 121 of his Rasamañjarī, illustrating Sātivikā-bhāvas, Bhānudatta refers to Nijāma-dharanīpāla, who, as his commentator Anantapandita points out, is Ahmad Nizam Shah, who took Daulatabad between 1499-1507 A.D., and founded the Nizam Shahi dynasty of Deccan, and a manuscript of a commentary on his Rasamañjarī by Gopālabhatta (Stein, Kashmir Catalogue, extracts p. 273) is dated 1572 A.D.

Besides the Rasamañjarī, which figures much in the Śrngāramañjarī, as the basic text on the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās in love, Bhānudatta wrote the Rasataranginī which dealt more fully with the subject of Rasas, the Alankāratilaka, yet unprinted, on rhetoric, the Rasa Pārijāta an anthology, a Śrngāradīpikā,² an imitation of the Gītagovinda called Gītagaurīpatī, and the Kumārabhārgāvīya Campū.

V

Classification of Nāyikās and Nāyakas.

Bharata defines drama as the representation of characters, Prakṛtis, in emotional states, Avasthās, and characters of the world whose moods are to be represented, are infinitely varied not only in their emotional states, but also in their very nature, Śīla¹

Different persons in different ages, countries, levels of culture, character and emotional condition will dress, walk, look, speak, react and behave differently. In emotion whose representation is of paramount importance, the same feeling will exhibit itself differently in persons of different ages, temperaments and culture. To enable the actor, therefore, to understand completely this variety and complexity in nature and mood in the characters that he is to portray, Bharata analyses them and shows some leading classes. Indicatory as Bharata's analysis is, it is yet more detailed, more varied and more comprehensive of the different aspects of character, conduct and condition than what is found preserved or developed in later works of dramaturgy, poetics or erotics.

The first and basic classification which Bharata gives is one of universal application, referring not only to both men and women, but also to the further classifications of these two, Bharata applies it even to the audience. This classification of men and women as superior, middling and inferior, Uttama, Madhyama and Adhama, is preserved in Alankāra works on Nāyaka-Nāyikā, and in the Śrngāramañjarī, it has been shown in great detail with reference to all classes and sub-classes of women and her friends and accomplices too (pp 39-41). To begin with, Bharata shows this in Hāsya Rasa, how the three kinds of Prakrtis, the Uttamā or dignified, the Madhyamā or ordinary and the Adhamā or base will each exhibit his or her laugh differently, the exhibition starting with the gentle smile of the first, the superior type, becoming less and less refined and exploding into loudest laughter in the last, the base type (K M edn VI 52-60). The differences in dressing shown by these three kinds of persons are mentioned in the chapter on make-up (Āhārya, XXI 114-118-9). These three main classes are mentioned in XXVI 54-56 with reference to members of the audience, Preksakas. This classification of character into three main varieties is again mentioned by Bharata, while emphasising the need for actors to choose such parts as would be in conformity with their own natures and thus would be easily representable (Kasī edn XXXV 6-7). That it could be applied to special varieties individually is shown in XXII 227-8, where Bharata speaks of Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā in the Vāsakasajjikā type. It is in the next chapter that Bharata describes this classification as applying to all Nāyikās in general.² In XXIII. 34-40, Bharata says

सर्वासामेव नारीणां त्रिविधा प्रकृतिः स्मृता । उत्तमा मध्यमा चैव तृतीया चाधमा स्मृता ॥

The descriptions that follow show clearly that this classification applies to both Kulānganā and Veśyā. The Uttamā does not speak unpleasantly to the lover even if he has erred, does not have longstanding anger, covers up faults; is sought after by the lover by virtue of her pedigree, beauty and wealth, is an adept in love; considerate; and knows what to do and when, and has no jealousy, nor any anger without due cause. The Madhyamā herself seeks her lover and is also sought after by him, is jealous, quick to anger, and haughty but is easily pacified. The Adhamā is angry without reason and for long, is severe and unfavourable. While in XXIV. 1, Bharata emphasises again that this threefold classification pertains to all, men and women, it is in ch. XXXIV. 1-12, (Kasī edn.)¹ that he gives it as applying comprehensively to all persons, whether men or women. Men of knowledge, self-control, consideration for others, compassion, learning, dignity, depth, firmness and liberality are Uttamas; those who are clever in pleasing society, accomplished in arts and pleasant in behaviour are Madhyamas, those of severe tongue, bad conduct and disposition, meagre brains, who are angry, violent, ungrateful, treacherous, arrogant, lazy, and given to lust, quarrel and theft are Adhamas. Among women, those who are soft, not fickle, smiling, devoid of severity, appreciative of others' merits, bashful, modest and beautiful, of good pedigree, and pleasant, firm and deep are Uttamās, those possessed of a lower degree of these qualities and are vitiated by some defects are Madhyamās and those who are further inferior in these respects are Adhamās.

Nāyikās

In ch XXII dealing with Sāmānyābhīnaya, Bharata has an elaborate classification of women on the basis of their Śīla, nature, behaviour, tastes etc., and in terms of gods, demigods, demons, human being, birds and animals (verses 94-139, Kasī edn. ch. XXIV 94-136).

सुखस्य च स्त्रियो मूलं नानाशीलधराश्च ताः ।
 देवतासुरगन्धर्वरक्षोनागपतत्रिणाम् ।
 पिशाचक्रुश्चव्यालानां नरवानरहस्तिनाम् ।
 मृगमीनोष्ट्रमकरखरसूकरवाजिनाम् ॥
 महिषाजगवादीनां तुल्यशीलाः स्त्रियः स्मृताः । (94-96)

The characteristics taken here for the purpose of this classification comprehend physical, psychological and sexual features and tastes in matters of food, dress and decoration, some of which form the basis of the later fourfold classification of women into Padminī, Citrinī, Śankhinī and Hastinī. Beyond this, this classification has no survival in works of Alankarā śāstra on Nāyaka-Nāyikā-classification. It was perhaps thought that this was more in place in treatises on Kāma śāstra, but even there, it is found only in Kokkoka's Ratirahasya and works following it, and not in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtras. In ch IV verses 14-20 of his Ratirahasya, Kokkoka describes briefly some of these classes; he leaves out many but adds a Kāka-sattvā not found in Bharata. From the verses at the beginning and end of this section in the Ratirahasya (II 7 and 21), it would appear that this classification follows the views expressed in the work Gunapatākā and by writers like Mūladeva, and Jyotirīśvara's Pañcasāyaka, which too mentions some of these classes, gives Bābhavya and Mūladeva as the authorities for this classification. Jyotirīśvara satisfies himself with just four classes (I. 29-32) under this head, Deva, Gandharva, Yakṣa and Preta, the last being found neither in Nātyaśāstra nor in Ratirahasya. Nine of these find mention also in Kalyāṇamalla's Anangaranga.

The next classification of women given by Bharata is another threefold one, Bāhya, Ābhyantara and Bāhyābhyantara (145-7). The Ābhyantara or the near is one's own wife born of a good family (kulastrī), the Bāhya or the external is the courtesan, Veśyā, the Bāhyābhyantara described as Kṛta-śaucā is obscure, if we can emend it to krta-śaucā, she would be the impure or unchaste wife who has erred with another man *

Bharata then speaks of the eightfold classification of Nāyikās on the basis of their emotional states, which is fully preserved in all later works on the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā as well as of dramaturgy Vāsakasajjitā, Virahotkanthitā, Svādhīnapatikā, Kalahāntarītā, Khanditā, Vipralabdhā, Proṣṭabhartṛkā and Abhisārikā (verses 197-206) Bharata defines these and shows how they should be portrayed, taking some of these eight, he sets forth elaborately how characters in those states will or should act, in Abhisārikā he shows how the three sub-varieties Kulajā, Veśyā and Presyā (i.e. woman-attendant) will proceed to the tryst (215-215), the actions of the Vāsakasajjikā are then described (223-230) after which those of the Virahotkanthitā are shown, Īrsyā or jealousy and its four forms and the resultant type Kalahāntarītā are then described

In Ch XXIII devoted to Vaisika, courtesan-love, Bharata speaks of three classes of the Vaisikī type, the courtesan —the Madanātūrā or one craving for company and showing it by openly disporting herself (verse 18), the Raktā or the courtesan who is attached to a particular lover (19-22) and the Viraktā or the courtesan who is averse (23-26)

In the next chapter, corresponding to the four types of heroes, Dhīroddhata etc., Bharata gives four kinds of heroines the divine lady (Divyā), the queen or princess (Nrpa-patnī), the family-woman (Kulastrī) and the courtesan (Ganikā) (6-7). It does not mean that each of the male-types has one of the four woman-types as its corresponding heroine, while the first, *Dhīroddhata*s who are gods will have only Divyās as their heroines, Dhīralalitas like kings have for their heroines the Nrpa-patnī in the main, and the Ganikā, ministers etc. who are Dhīrodāttas, and Brāhmans and merchants who are Dhīraprasāntas have Kulastrī primarily and the Ganikā as their Nāyikās. According to verse 8, we may suppose that the four corresponding Nāyikā-names are Dhīrā (for Uddhata), Lalitā, Udāttā and Nibhṛtā (meaning Praśāntā) The Kulastrī is Udātta-nibhṛtā and the Ganikā, Udātta-lalitā (XXIV.9). According to the Nāṭya-darpana (p 200), the Kulastrī is only Nibhṛtā and the Divyā and Nrpa-patnī are of all the three kinds, Dhīrā, Lalitā and Udāttā

In the same chapter, with reference only to heroines figuring in a king's love, Bharata says that the ladies of the king are of various kinds and status, Mahādevī, Devī, Svāminī, Sthāyinī, Bhoginī, Śilpakārī, Nātakīyā and Nartakī, some of whom can be understood from plays like the Mālavikāgnimitra. This, like the previous, is a classification germane in works on dramaturgy only.

As pointed out already the Kāmasūtras of Vātsyāyana deal with classes of women in a different manner. The types called after gods, demigods, animals and birds mentioned by Bharata are totally absent from his work, though later Kāmasāstra texts, taking material from other traditions too, mention some of them. Apart from the difference in tradition, the point of view from which Vātsyāyana deals with types of men and women is different from that of Bharata, Bharata has to concentrate on the elaboration of the feeling and its representation, while Vātsyāyana has to examine the material from the sexual aspect, but as there is common ground between the two in the emotion of love, we find in the Kāmasūtras some material coming within the scope of our study. There is a further reason why the Kāmasāstra material has to be reviewed here, for we find some of the later writers on the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā incorporating part of this material in their works.

One of the classifications of women well-known in later Kāmasūtra literature is that into Padminī, Citrinī, Śankhinī and Hastinī, which works in Sanskrit on Nāyaka-Nāyikā ignore as being more proper in regular Kāmasāstra treatises, but which our work, Śṛṅgāramañjarī, takes up, following the example set in this respect by a few later works written in Hindi. This classification, to which I shall devote some attention below, is absent from Vātsyāyana's work. The allied fourfold classification of men into Bhadra, etc. is also not to be found in Vātsyāyana.

In I 5 3-4, Vātsyāyana mentions the Nāyikās as being of three kinds, Kanyā, Punarbhū and Veśyā, the maiden, the remarried woman and the courtesan. According to Gonikāputra, it is said, the Para-parigrhītā, another's wife, is also an occasional Nāyikā. While later texts, both on dramaturgy and erotics, with the exception of Bhoja's works and some minor ones, omit the Punarbhū, all of them add the other man's wife, referred to as Parakīyā, as a regular type. They omit Punarbhū altogether most probably because of the lead given by Rūdrabhaṭṭa who in his Śṛṅgāratilaka (K M Guccaka III, 1, 46) says that, as the Punarbhū is of the same nature as the Mugdhā and as the difference between them is very slight, the Punarbhū has not been shown separately by writers. The Parakīyā, Vātsyāyana mentions here as being introduced by Gonikāputra as a Pāksika-nāyikā to be sought only where she is known to have gone astray and has rendered herself, like a courtesan, open for righteous seeking (I 5 5-6). To Pāradārika or love affairs with such a woman, dealt with specially and separately by Gonikāputra himself (I 1 16), Vātsyāyana too devotes one section of his work (Vth), and mentions the Parakīyā in II 10 54 also. Cārāyana who had separately elaborated the general, Sādhārana, section of the Kāmasāstra, adds the widow, Vidhavā, as the fifth Nāyikā (I 5 22). Others add other Nāyikās too. Suvarṇanābha, specialist in the section on the actual sexual acts, Sāmprayogika, adds the recluse-woman, Parivrājikā, and Ghotakamukha, authority on the section dealing with maiden, adds the daughter of the courtesan and the female attendant (I 5 23, 24), Gonardīya, author of a special work on the wedded wife, to whom again Vātsyāyana devotes a section of his work, adds appropriately the lawfully wedded virtuous wife, Kula-yuvatī, as a separate Nāyikā, and this is to be specially taken note of because, in later texts on Nāyaka-Nāyikā, this Kula-yuvatī with the name Svīyā becomes the first regular Nāyikā-type. Vātsyāyana however thinks that the three classes Kanyā, Punarbhū and Veśyā would suffice, as all the others could be brought under these, particularly the Kula-yuvatī could be brought under the Kanyakā. Gonardīya notes this explanation and therefore adds in his proposition a statement of the reason for the separate enumeration of the Kula-yuvatī, according to him, the Kula-yuvatī is different from the girl which Kanyakā is, she is one who has entered youth and as the attentions that she should be paid are different, she is a separate Nāyikā. This difference in the circumstances and methods associated with the Kanyakā and the Kulastri has been well recognised by later writers who align the former not with the Kulastri as Vātsyāyana does, but with the Parakīyā. For purposes of the Kāmasāstra, Vātsvāyana then mentions that a further type, the eunuch, is mentioned by some (I 5 27) and devotes later a sub-section to this type (II 9), but this is irrelevant to our subject of enquiry. In I. 5. 33, Bābhṛavya (Pāñcāla) mentions that the woman who has seen five men, whatever her station in society, is to be considered open for seeking and according to the commentary, Jayamangalā, this is the type called Svairinī whom Parāśara designates Bandhakī (harlot), Vātsyāyana himself mentions later the Kulatās and Svairinīs in II. 9 2I, and VI 6. 54 While in the latter context Vātsyāyana gives them as varieties of Veśyā, later works on Nāyaka-Nāyikā deal with this Kulatā as a Parakīyā-variety.

In four separate sections, Vātsyāyana deals with Kanyā, Bhāryā, Parādāra and Veśyā and we may note some of the ideas here as these have been used by later writers and have led to the formulation of sub-varieties under these types. In his description of Kanyā-visrambhana, the gradual and delicate manner by which the newly wedded and just adolescent wife is to be inducted into responsive company, Vātsyāyana speaks of her initial aversion (Ratau vāmā), her excessive bashfulness (Atilajjā) and gradual growth of confidence (Visrambha), all of which have been noted and illustrated by later writers while dealing with the Mugdhā-variety under the Svīyā-type, the Mugdhā is also mentioned in the Pāradārīka as one of the Dūtīs (Mūdhadūtī) who could be employed by her husband or his secret beloved for furthering their mutual clandestine love affair (V 4 57). Under Bhāryā, Vātsyāyana speaks of Jyesthā and Kanīsthā (IV 2) in cases where there are two wives, this classification of Svīyā into Jyesthā and Kanīsthā is adopted and adapted in Nāyaka-Nāyikā works (see Śrngāramañjarī, p 7), with their meaning changed in some later works into the very reverse of what they signify in Vātsyāyana. In the Kāmasūtras, the earlier and senior wife is given as the Jyesthā and the later married second wife, as the Kanīsthā, while this is followed in many Ālankāra and Rasa works, in some later Nāyaka-Nāyikā works, the later married younger wife, who would be the object of the greater love of the husband, is the Jyesthā, and the earlier and older one, towards whom the husband would be less attached, is the Kanīsthā. The two varieties under Parodhā Parakīyā mentioned in our Śrngāramañjarī (pp 8-9), Udbuddhā and Udbodhitā, are assumed in the whole description of the ways of Pāradārīka-love in V. 1-3, particularly, Kāmasūtras V. 3 33,34 speak of these two varieties¹. The elaborate tips given in V 4 for rousing her love refer to the Udbodhitā, one in whom love is induced by her paramour by several means. The idea of 'secret' and 'open', introduced later to create two sub-varieties of the Parakīyā, can also be seen to be foreshadowed in the open and the secret unions mentioned by Vātsyāyana in Pāradārīka (Prakāśa-kāmita and Pracchanna-yoga V 5 28-30).

One of the points discussed at some length in the Śrngāramañjarī is whether real love as such could be associated with Veśyā (pp 12-13), the Śrngāramañjarī concludes that she has real love for one person, though for running her profession, she pretends love towards many. This is the view of Bharata and Vātsyāyana, the latter says many times that the Veśyā has love and she can be really devoted to one person, at the very opening of the Vaiśika-section, we find Vātsyāyana saying that the Veśyā seeks men for love and profit, and that the former end is the natural one and the latter artificial (VI 1 1,2). The courtesan devoted to one lover like the loyal wife is referred to as the Eka-cārīnī in IV 1 54 and VI 2 1 and answers to the Niyamitā-variety of the Sāmānyā given in the Śrngāramañjarī.

The eight Nāyikās classified by their emotional conditions are not directly mentioned by Vātsyāyana, as they do not fall within the scope of his work, but some of them are presupposed by him, and one is even mentioned more than once. In V 1 52, the Proṣitapatikā is mentioned as one of the women whose condition is such as to make them easy objects of temptation. IV 1 43ff deal elaborately with the life of the Proṣitapatikā among Bhāryās, i.e., the Pravāsa-caryā of the wedded lady of virtue whose husband has gone on travel. II 10. 40-48, dealing with Pranaya-kalaha, contemplate a variety of the Kalahāntarītā.

1. In V 3 35, Vātsyāyana uses the expressions Dhīrā and (A)pragalbhā, but not in the sense in which they are used in later Nāyaka-Nāyikā works.

The classification of men and women on the basis solely of their physical sexual feature, Śaśa, Vrsa and Aśva, Mṛgī, Vaḍavā and Hastinī in Vātsyāyāna II. 1 1-2 is irrelevant to our discussion

For the next theoretical work containing material pertaining to the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā varieties, we have to come to the Śrngāratilaka of Rudrabhaṭṭa¹. Here, for the first time we find the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā dealt with in a systematic manner with all the varieties and sub-varieties clearly worked out. What works existed in the gap between the Nāṭyaśāstra and the Kāmasūtras on the one hand and the Śrngāratilaka on the other, and by what further stages the process of clear codification of the types of lovers attained the systematic formulation found in the work of Rudrabhaṭṭa, we do not know

Rudrabhaṭṭa first classifies the Nāyikā into Svakīyā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā, of these Svakīyā, one's own wedded and virtuous wife, is said to have the varieties Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, Mugdhā who is the Nava-Vadhū (newly married) is described as (1) Nava-Nauvanā (just adolescent), (2) Nava-anangī-rahasyā (new to the secrets of love) and (3) Lajjā-prāya-ratī (beset by bashfulness in her enjoyment), and Rudrabhaṭṭa illustrates all these three aspects of the Mugdhā (I 33-35). This kind of description in the earlier works of the Nāyikā-types by mention of the main aspects of their nature is to be noted, because for a long time to come, writers did not propose specific sub-varieties under each Nāyikā-type, but described only, in the above manner, the leading characteristics of each type². The Madhyā is then described in terms of four leading features characterising her, growth of youth, growth of love, emboldened converse, and skill in enjoyment, which are all similarly illustrated (39). The Madhyā is further classified into Dhīrā, Madhyā, etc., Dhīrādhīrā and Adhīrā, according to the manner in which she reacts to her husband's misconduct; the first flings sarcastic remarks at him (Vaktiokti) in her anger, the next weeps, and the third taunts severely, the distinctions being caused by the degree of self-possession and its absence (I 41). The Pragalbhā is likewise defined by four characteristics showing the position she has gained in the heart of her lover and her maturity in the art of love, blandishments and enjoyment (I 42). The description here in I 43 of the ecstatic enjoyment of the Pragalbhā gave rise later to the sub-variety Ratyānandaparavaśā (see Śr mañ p 5). The Pragalbhā too has the three varieties, Dhīrā, etc., the Dhīrā here hides her mental reaction, and shows indifference to her lover and his company, the Dhīrādhīrā assails him with her complaints full of yearning, and the Adhīrā threatens and strikes him. The Madhyā and Pragalbhā are again said to be divisible into Jyesthā and Kanīsthā from the point of view of the love of the lover, in cases where there are two wives (I 47-8).

The Parakīyā is then classified into Kanyā and Parodhā (I 50). The third main type Sāmānyā is the common woman and Rudrabhaṭṭa says that though some consider her as interested only in money, and not in love, he is of opinion that she too, as a woman, has her love, without which hers will become a case of the semblance of sentiment, Rasābhāsa (I 62-65).

Rudrabhaṭṭa then speaks of the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās, Svādhīnapatikā, Utkā, Vāsakasajjikā, Atisandhitā, Vipralabdhā, Khaṇḍitā, Abhisārikā and Prositapriyā, and defines and illustrates them (I 72-82). The type later designated Kalahāntarītā is, it must be noted, called here Atisandhitā. Following Bharata, Rudrabhaṭṭa too shows how the different varieties of the Abhisārikā would each proceed to her tryst. All these are again classifiable as Uttamās, Madhyamās and Adhamās (I. 88). The Uttamā's anger is in proportion to the fault of her lover, she is pacified by entreaty, is deeply attached, and is moved by the qualities of her lover. The Madhyamā is enraged at slight faults, difficult of pacification, and shows her attachment only for some purpose. The Adhamā is one who gets angry without cause, becomes fond even without pacification by the lover and fickle and wayward in her acts. Rudrabhatta sums up that the total varieties would thus come to $13+2+1 \times 8 \times 3 = 384$ (I. 87-88), but he adds that by reason of class, time, age, condition, feeling, love and lover, varieties of Nāyikās have really no end. The Śrngāratilaka is a basic text for the Nāyaka-Nāyikā topic, its verses are used totally or with some changes, and its main heads of classification and computation of the total varieties are accepted by all later writers.

There are also some other topics on which too we might note the ideas in the Śrngāratilaka, as these are all used in the later works. While dealing with the Parakīyā (I. 50-51), Rudrabhatta refers to the rise of love by seeing or hearing, and to seeing being either actual or in painting or dream. This, already found in Bharata, has been adopted in all later works and some sub-varieties are also made out of this in our Śrngāramañjarī (p. 21). In II. 32-41, Rudrabhatta describes Māna and its three varieties, strong, ordinary and light, Guru, Madhya and Laghu. Māna is defined as the reaction born of jealousy caused by the lover's relation with another lady, it is strong when the lady finds her lover actually gone to another lady, bears marks of her company, and utters her name in dream, it is ordinary when the lover is seen talking to another lady or is reported by the Nāyikā's friend as interested in another lady, it is light when the lover is noticed casting his graceful glance on another lady. Māna, rendered as anger, Kopa, is then shown as being pacifiable either easily or with great difficulty. Even strong Māna is easily removed if the time and place are such as to excite love, for e.g., moonlight and spring. Then are mentioned six means of removing this Māna, meek pleading, gift of ornament and the like, bringing her round by first winning over her friends, apparent indifference, straight prostration, and the extraneous circumstance of a sudden change in the situation, each succeeding one being more potent than the previous (I. 42-50). All these ideas are used by later writers in their delineation of the variety called Mānavatī.

Closely related to Rudrabhatta's Śrngāratilaka is Rudrata's Kāyālankāra¹, the mutual chronology of these two authors, confused as identical by many writers, ancient and modern, being one of the standing problems in the history of Sanskrit poetics. As the similarity between these two texts on Nāyaka-Nāyikās is very close, extending to verbal identity in most passages, we need note here only the few points where some peculiarities are seen. In the description of the Mugdhā (XII. 18), the expression Navodhā is used, and this became later the name of one of the sub-varieties of the Mugdhā. In fourteen verses that follow, noted as interpolation, the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās and the threefold classification, Uttamā etc are given. In a further verse it is pointed out that while the Abhisārikā and Khanditā varieties occur in all the three main types, the Svīyā has only the two varieties Svādhīnapatīkā and Proṣitapatīkā (XII. 41). It would appear that Rudrata's text originally mentioned only these four out of the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās, Abhisārikā, Khanditā, Svādhīnapatīkā and Proṣitapatīkā, as the fourteen earlier verses mentioning all the eight are not commented upon by Namisādhū, and what is more, Namisādhū expressly states in his comments on XII. 44 that two of the other Nāyikās, Vipralabdhā and Kalahāntarītā are included in Khanditā.

In the Daśarūpaka and the Avaloka thereon, we have material on our subject which contributed further to the definite fixation of the types and their descriptions and definitions in later works. Dhanañjaya speaks of the Nāyikā-types in ch 2, verses 15ff. Svīyā, Anyā, Sādhārana-strī are mentioned first, Svīyā is characterised by chastity, straightforwardness and bashfulness, and classified into Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, Mugdhā is characterised by young age, inexperience in love, aversion at bed, and soft temper, all the four of which are illustrated by Dhanika, with the remark that there are also other characteristic aspects of the Mugdhā's behaviour, all of which, however, are controlled by the dominant feature of bashfulness. Madhyā is characterised by grown-up age and love, and desire for enjoyment. The three classes Dhīrā, Adhīrā, Dhīrādhīrā are then defined and illustrated, Dhanika adding here again the remark that similarly other aspects of the Madhyā's behaviour are to be gathered, their common feature being the absence of the stifling domination of bashfulness that marked the earlier stage. The Pragalbhā is characterised by full development of youth, feeling, art of love and the tendency to lose herself in enjoyment. In illustrating these, the Avaloka adds that there are yet other acts of the Pragalbhā, their main features being adeptness and the total elimination of the restraining force of bashfulness. The Dhīrā etc. of this type are then shown, and the two, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, are again classified into Jyesthā and Kanīsthā. Anya-strī, falling into the two classes, Kanyakā and Ūdhā (i.e., Parodhā) are then mentioned, with the remark that the latter should not be featured in the leading theme. The Avaloka adds the explanation for including the Kanyakā in Anya-strī. The Sādhārana-strī is described as the courtesan accomplished in arts, adept in love and bold in behaviour, though she is mainly intent on professional simulation of love, she is to be featured in the Prakaraṇa as a Nāyikā having real love (Raktā), the professional type being permissible only in the Prahasana (farce), Dhanañjaya adds further that even the Raktā-Sāmānyā ought not to be featured as a Nāyikā in plays having divine beings or kings as heroes, i.e., Nāṭaka and the like as the Avaloka explains. Whatever the type of drama to which the Vikramorvaśīya belongs, the Nāṭyadarpaṇa rightly feels that, with reference to this condition, an exception should be made in favour of Kālidāsa's play featuring the divine courtesan Ūrvaśī as the heroine and king Purūravās as the hero.¹ The eight Avāsthā-Nāyikās are then dealt with, the name Atisandhita in Rudrabhatta and Rudrata being replaced by Kalahāntarītā which became settled later. The Avaloka clearly explains how these eight are mutually exclusive and cannot be reduced in number. In Dhanañjaya's definitions of these eight Nāyikās, two points have to be noted. First, he makes it clear that in the case of the Virahotkanṭhitā, the delay caused in the arrival of the lover should not be due to any attachment to another lady,—cirayati avyalyike, this is essential, as otherwise the definition will apply to Khanḍitā too. Second, the Abhisārikā is said to be of two kinds, one that goes herself to her lover (Abhisāratī) and the other that brings the lover to her presence through a messenger (Abhisārayatī), and Dhanika illustrates both varieties. This is a question on which opinion became divided later, some holding both varieties as Abhisārikā and others omitting the latter, and our text, the Śṛṅgāramañjarī, has a clear discussion on this, showing the impossibility of the latter being a variety of the Abhisārika (p 37). Dhanañjaya concludes the section by pointing out that of these eight, the first two are marked by joy and dalliance by reason of union (Sambhoga) experienced or expected, the remaining eight being marked by moods and effects of separation (Vipralambha) (II 28); the Avaloka has here an elucidation which has been regularly adopted by later writers,² namely that of these eight states, the Parakīyā has only three, Virahotkanṭhitā, Abhisārikā and Vipralabdhā. In the last chapter, while dealing with phases of love, Dhanañjaya has occasion to speak of Māna and Pravāsa, as part of Vipralambha Śṛṅgāra. (IV 58-67) Māna is here divided into Pranaya-māna and Īrṣyā-māna, and the situations leading to the latter, its three varieties, Guru, Madhya and Laghu, and the means of its removal are also set forth (IV 58-64) Pravāsa and its varieties due to business (Kārya), natural calamities and political and social disturbances (Sambhrama) and curse (Śāpa) are then shown (IV 64-66) In view of the later discussions on the three possible varieties of the Prositapatikā with reference to past, present and future, it is relevant to note that in his comments and illustrations here, Dhanika mentions all these three sub-varieties, one whose husband is to go (Yāsyat-pravāsa), is going (gacchat-pravāsa) and has gone (gata-pravāsa) The case in which the lover has returned, Avasita-pravāsa-patikā, is taken by some later writers as a further variety of the Prositapatikā and our work Śrngāramañjarī discusses this question (pp 16-17) and concludes that the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā should go into the Vāsakasajjikā In connection with this discussion it is interesting to note that Dhanika touches it and opines that the case in which the lover is returning or has returned cannot be included in Pravāsa Dhanañjaya then gives the distribution of the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās among the different phases of love,—the Utkanthitā figures in Pranaya-māna (-vipralambha) and Ayoga or Pūrvā-nurāgi (-vipralambha), Prositapatikā in Pravāsa (-vipralambha) and Kalahāntarītā, Vipralabdā and Khanditā in Īrsyā (-vipralambha)

Bhoja deals with the Nāyaka-Nāyikās in both his works, the Sarasvatikanthā-bharana¹ (S K Ā) and the Śingāraprakāśa² (Śr Pra) In ch 15 of the latter work, Bhoja speaks of the Nāyikās after dealing with the Nāyakas (Mad Ms Vol 3, pp 111-160) It was already remarked that the Punarbhū mentioned as a main Nāyikā-type by Vātsyāyana, but given up by later writers, was revived by Bhoja This however is not the only point on which Bhoja's treatment shows originality The four primary classes of Nāyikās according to Bhoja are Svakiyā, Parakiyā, Punarbhū and Sāmānyā, the Svakiyā and the Parakiyā are each classified into Uttamā, Madhyamā, Kanīsthā, Ūdhā, Anūdhā, Adhīrā, Dhīrā, Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, this classification yields a total number of 143 varieties of Nāyikās for each of these two types The Punarbhū is divided into Aksatā, Ksatā, Yātāyātā and Yāyāvarā The Sāmānyā falls into five sub-classes, Ūdhā, Anūdhā, Svayamvarā, Svairinī and Veśyā, the last being further sub-divided into Ganikā, Vilāsini and Rūpājivā Further sub-varieties of Uttamā etc under Punarbhū and Sāmānyā are not worked out but left to be deduced The eight Avasthā-Nāyikās are then enumerated and illustrated. See my Bhoja's Śingāra Prakāśa, vol I pp 32-33 In his S K Ā., Bhoja mentions these varieties with some difference, and defines and illustrates some of them in ch V pp 485-486, 592-601 On the Mugdhā and Pragalbhā, there is no difference in Bhoja's definition, though he puts the definitions here in a brief and compact manner, वयःकौशलभ्यामसपूर्णा, वयसा पूर्णा and वयःकौशलभ्या सपूर्णा respectively In both the works, Bhoja omits under the Māna-varieties the third Dhīrādhīrā, and gives only Dhīrā and Adhīrā Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā, the last of which is omitted in the Śr Pra, are again briefly defined as full, three-fourths full and half-full in excellences On Jyesthā and Kanīsthā, of which the former is not given in the Śr. Pra, Bhoja follows Vātsyāyana and considers the earlier married elder wife as Jyesthā and the later married younger one as Kanīsthā³ Ūdhā and Anūdhā are only once illustrated here but in the Śr. Pra. Bhoja illustrates them twice, under Svakiyā, Parakiyā and Sāmānyā, the Ūdhā and Anūdhā under the former are illustrated from Kumārasambhava by Pārvatī after the marriage and before the marriage, the Ūdhā and Anūdhā under the Sāmānyā are illustrated by Draupadī who was the lawfully wedded common wife of five husbands, and Sītā before her marriage. Thus while the former, Ūdhā Sāmānyā, will be a unique class created for Draupadī, the Anūdhā Sāmānyā appears to apply to all Ksatriya-maiden. In Bhoja's definition of the Svakiyā, Parakiyā and Sāmānyā there is no departure, but the sub-classes of Sāmānyā are to be noted, in the S K Ā, Bhoja merely defines and illustrates the Sāmānyā, but in the Śr. Pra he gives her five varieties, Ūdhā and Anūdhā, already explained, Svayamvarā, Svairinī and Veśyā. The Svayamvarā is illustrated by Indumatī in the Raghuvamśa, she choosing her husband in an open assemblage of suitors. The difference between Anūdhā Sāmānyā illustrated by Sītā and Svayamvarā illustrated by Indumatī seems to be that while both refer to Ksatriya-women open for free choice among suitors, the former, like the unique Ūdhā Sāmānyā illustrated by Draupadī, would be a special class created for heroines like Sītā, in the case of both Draupadī and Sītā, there is no doubt a Svayamvara, but what distinguishes them from the third type, a mere Svayamvarā like Indumatī, is that in their case there is a Vīryaśulka, the stipulation of a heroic feat, which reduces the scope of the Svayamvara. The other two classes of Sāmānyā, Svairinī and Veśyā call for no special elucidation, as they are well-known in other works, the former as a sub-variety and the latter as the main form of the Sāmānyā, but mention must be made of the sub-classes of Veśyā which Bhoja gives in both the Śr. Pra and the S K.Ā, the Ganikā who is accomplished in all the arts, the Vilāsini who flirts, and the Rūpājivā who trades on her physical beauty. The Punarbhū re-introduced by Bhoja is simply defined and illustrated once in the S K Ā, but in the Śr. Pra, greater attention is paid to her. She is classified into Aksatā, Ksatā, Yātāyātā and Yāyāvarā, three of these terms being adopted from the Dharmaśāstra, Aksatā, illustrated by Satyavatī, is one who has had contact with a male before marriage, Ksatā is a married lady who, after her husband's death, is taken by another as wife,¹ Yātāyātā is illustrated by Tārā (the star not Vālin's wife) who was Brhaspati's wife, was seduced by Candra to whom she bore Budha, but was then made to come back (Yāta-āyātā) to her original husband, Yāyāvara, according to Devala's Smṛti, is an itinerant variety of the house-holder, Gihastha, as opposed to the Śālina who had settled down in a fixed abode, on this analogy, Bhoja gives the Yāyāvarā variety of a Punarbhū, illustrated by Mādhavī who was on the move from place to place, marrying four husbands successively, Kramena sad-bhartr-catustayī, bearing each of them a son, and finally retired to the Vindhya for penance, this again is, like that of Draupadī, a unique class created for Mādhavī, who was the daughter of Yayāti and had a boon by which, immediately after each delivery, her maidenhood was restored (Mahābhārata, Kumbhakonam edn, Ādi 87 Ud 116-120).

Among subsequent writers, the author of the Mandāra-maranda-campū notes these four classes Ksatā etc., with the mention of Bhoja's name (K M. 52, sect 7, p 80).

अक्षता च क्षता यातायाता यायावरेत्यपि ।

पुनश्चतुर्धा कथिताः पूर्वैर्भोजादिभिर्बुधैः ॥

These are defined and illustrated later on pp. 84-5 of the work, where the author makes a mistake in the definition and illustration of the Yātāyātā.²

¹ Bhoja illustrates this by Mandodarī, giving a verse that records a hitherto unknown tradition

In addition to these, Bhoja gives in the S K Ā. four Nāyikās corresponding to the four Nāyakas, Dhīra-udāttā etc., which he omits in the Śr Pra. The Uddhatā is haughty; Udāttā is one who has a deep hidden sense of prestige, gūḍha-mānārdhī, the Śāntā is one whose Māna has completely subsided, nīrvāna-mānā, the Lalitā is one in whom the play of Māna becomes delectable, ślāghaniya-mānā; in fact, up to a stage, this kind of Māna forms an essential part of love. Correspondence with the four hero-types, Dhīroddhata, Dhīrodāttā, Dhīraśānta and Dhīralalita is clear, and we may note here that these four classes have been defined on the basis of Māna, with reference to which the word Dhairya is used in the well-known Nāyikā-classification Dhīrā and Adhīrā. In Bharata, however, the Nāyikā-types Dhīrā, Lalitā, Udāttā and Nībhṛtā, given immediately after the four Nāyaka-types, Dhīroddhata etc., and implying their mutual correspondence, bear a more comprehensive and general significance (XXIV. 6-9, K M edn.)

The eight Avasthā-Nāyikās are mentioned in the S.K.Ā. also.

The Bhāvaprakāśa¹ of Śāradātanaya makes up its matter on the Nāyikās from Bharata, Rudrabhatta (referred to consistently as Rudrata), Dhanañjaya and Bhoja (Pp 95-102, 109-112). Verses are completely reproduced from the Nāṭyaśāstra, Śrngāra-tilaka and Daśarūpaka. As already mentioned, Śāradātanaya is one of the few writers to include in their work Bharata's classification of women on the basis of differences in their behaviour, in terms of gods, demigods, animals and birds, the Bhāvaprakāśa reproduces the Nāṭyaśāstra verses here (pp 109-112). Following Bhoja, Śāradātanaya speaks of the Nāyikās, Udāttā etc., corresponding to the four Nāyakas, Dhīrodāttā etc. (Pp 95, line 2 and 97-8, lines 20-23, 1-15), but while Bhoja defines these in his Sarasvatīkanthā-bharana only on the basis of the feeling Māna, Śāradātanaya, working out the implication of their equation with the four hero-types, amplifies the definition of these. The Udāttā is the lady of dignified type, well-dressed, endowed with all material comforts and resources, firm in attachment, grateful, affectionate to dependents, paying due honour to those that deserve, given to festivities, delighting in the company of her kith and kin, and pleasant in speech. The Uddhatā is proud of her endowments in beauty, wealth, culture etc., given to slight her relatives, haughty, cunning and selfish. The Śāntā is happy and contented, free from jealousy or pride, helpful even to her enemies, and attentive towards relatives. The Lalitā is one given to the enjoyment of fine clothes, ornaments, sights and seasons, with a taste in love, indulging in graceful dalliance and accomplished in arts. We need not notice the detailed acts of behaviour characteristic of each, useful from the point of view of Abhinaya, which Śāradātanaya gives in describing the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās, but should take note of his remarks on p. 95 that, according to some, the Anyā or Parakīyā has only three of these states, Virahotkanthitā, Abhisārikā and Vipralabdā (lines 10-15),² which is taken from the Daśarūpaka-Avaloka (II 28).

The Nāṭakalaksanaratnakośa³ of Sāgaranandin, it is well-known, follows a tradition different from that handed down from Bharata on many points. In the section on Nāyikās, it gives primarily the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās only (lines 2519-2593); and it is only while dealing with the Abhisārikā-varieties that it mentions the Kulajā and Veśyā, i.e., the Svīyā and the Sāmānyā. The Parakīyā is not mentioned at all. After quoting Bharata on how these different kinds of Abhisārikās will proceed to their tryst, Sāgaranandin gives nine occasions as suitable for Abhisarana, of which dusk is considered by some as the only time proper for the Kulajā; according to others, there is no specific time or occasion for those in love-pangs (lines 2586-89). Regarding these Avasthā-Nāyikās, what is most interesting in Sāgaranandin's work is that he mentions an additional ninth Nāyikā called Sabhayā, which some propose. The Sabhayā is no doubt a type true to life; she is the wife in constant dread in her husband's home, who has just some occasions of mechanical enjoyment, but whose feelings are all smothered within her own heart (lines 2594-97); this, however, would not be an Avasthā-Nāyikā, but only a sub-variety under the Svīyā. It is interesting to find in such a late work as the Rasaratnahāra of Tripāthi Śivarāma¹ an additional type mentioned as Gurujanabhītā, which appears to be similar to this, but, from the illustration, seems to be a variety of the unchaste woman. A little earlier in the same section, Sāgaranandin speaks of Māna, where again the terminology adopted is not the one that we are used to (lines 2382ff). Instead of giving it as of three kinds, Guru, Madhya and Laghu, he mentions it as of four kinds, and called Mugdha, Manānmugdha, Samrddha and Atisamrddha, but we may equate Mugdha with Laghu, Manānmugdha with Madhya and the other two with Guru. In describing these varieties too, an original terminology is adopted, Vibhāvanā, Vakravacana and Prabhutva, of these the middle is the Vakrokti familiar to us, Vibhāvanā is explained as display of anger, and Prabhutva corresponds to Tarjana, Bandhana and Tādana, threatening, tying and striking with the garland, necklace etc. Sāgaranandin's citation of a verse here on these, as from Bharata, is naturally not to be found in the Nātyaśāstra.

In Hemacandra's Kāvyañuśāsana, there is nothing special to note on this subject, beyond what has already been referred to in the footnotes above under Bhoja and Śāradātanaya. In the Nātyadarpana² of his pupil, Rāmacandra, we may note the paragraph in which mention is made of the Udāttā etc., spoken of by Bharata. In the verses of Bharata, the distribution of Udāttā etc. over the types Kulajā etc. is not quite clear, the Nātyadarpana says on this point (p. 200) that the Kulajā (Svīyā) is Udāttā, the Veśyā (Sāmānyā) is both Udāttā and Lalitā, and the other two kinds of heroines Divyā and Ksatriyā are composite in nature, Dhīrā, Udāttā and Lalitā. The Śāntā type, Rāmacandra and Gunacandra say, is not to be figured along with divine or Ksatriya heroes. According to Bharata, however, the Śāntā, who is called Nibhrtā, is, along with Udāttā, assigned to the Kulajā class, and it is quite reasonable to take the Śāntā or Nibhrtā qualities as forming part of the Kulastri, in fact, Bharata includes the Nibhrtā (Śāntā) in the Divyā and Rājānganā (Ksatriyā) classes also.

Vāghbhata in his Alankāra³ has a few noteworthy points. Instead of giving the primary classes as three, he gives them as four, separating the Kanyā from the Parakīyā in whom others include her, Anūdhā (Kanyā), Svakīyā, Parakīyā and Parāṅganā (Ch. V, Śl. 8ff), the fact that reproach attaches to the Parakīyā proper justifies the separation of the Anūdhā from her. The Parakīyā is further divided in Jinavardhana's gloss⁴ into three sub-classes, one with her husband alive (Sadhavā), the widow (Vidhavā), the widow who has been taken by another (kenāpi svikrtā), i.e., a Punarbhū.

Śrīdharaḍāsa (A.D. 1205), in his anthology Saduktikarnāmṛta⁵ (pp. 66ff. section II), gives the following headings and illustrative verses on the subject of Nāyikā-varieties. Mugdhā, Madhyā, Praudhā, Navodhā, Vīrabdhā-navodhā, Kulajā (Satyavatī), Svairinī or Asatī classified into Guptā, Vīdagdhā and Laksitā, Veśyā, Khanditā, Anyā-sambhoga-cinḥa-duhkhītā, Vīraḥinī, Vāsakasajjā, Svādhīnabhartṛkā, Vipralabdhā, Kalahāntarītā, Mānīnī divided into Udāttā-mānīnī and Anuraktā-mānīnī, Pravasad-bhartṛkā, Prosita-bhartṛkā, Prosita-sambheda which is Avasita-pravāsa-patikā or Āgata-patikā and Abhisārikā (Divā-, Timīra-, Jyotsnā-, and Durdīna-).

Another anthology, the Śarṅgadharapaddhati⁶ (c. 1300) is noteworthy for mentioning the many varieties of women in terms of gods, demigods etc., given first by Bharata ; four of these, Devastrī, Apsaras, Yaksastrī and Rāksasī, as we shall note below, are equated with the four types Padminī etc. The verses on all these Nāyikās in this anthology are extracted from one Śrīdhara, probably a Kāmaśāstra writer.

The Pratāparudrayaśobhāsana of Vidyānātha briefly deals with the Nāyikās; Vidyānātha is one of the authors used and criticised in the Śrngāramañjarī, it has however no special point worth noting here in this historical survey.

The Sāhityadarpana of Viśvanātha (III 56ff) follows mostly the Śrngāratilaka, the Daśarūpaka and the Avaloka in the treatment of this subject, various aspects of Mugdhā etc, being mentioned, not by specifically named subvarieties, but by leading characteristics like Ratau vāmā, Māne mrdūh and so on. Of the two varieties of Parakīyā, Kanyā and Parodhā, Viśvanātha calls the latter class itself by the name Kulatā (III 66), whereas in the Śrngāramañjarī, Kulatā figures as a subvariety under Parodhā. To the Veśyā, Viśvanātha attributes occasional real love also (Kvāpī satyānurāginī (III.71) and illustrates the Raktā Veśyā by the heroine of the Mrcchakatika. Following the Daśarūpaka, and in common with many, Rāmacandra, Vāgbhata etc., Viśvanātha gives both varieties of the Abhisārikā (abhisārayatī and abhisaratī). In III 208, he gives also the three kinds of Pravāsa, Bhāvi, Bhavan and Bhūtah.

The treatment in the Rasārnavasudhākara¹ of Śingabhūpāla (pp 21 ff), which is one of the texts mentioned in the Śrngāramañjarī, is also on the same lines as those in the Sāhityadarpana, and calls for no detailed review. Śingabhūpāla just mentions in I 120 (p. 30) that, according to some, all the Nāyikās are classifiable from another point of view into Udāttā etc.

The appearance of the Rasamañjarī of Bhānudatta marks a definite period in the history of this subject of Nāyikā classification, before his time the subject was dealt with in works on drama or Rasa as one of the topics, Bhānudatta for the first time made it the sole theme of a separate book, and thereby gave rise to a class of works devoted exclusively to this subject. No doubt, even after him, the subject was dealt with by many as part of their larger works on drama and Rasa, but it was after him that this subject came to gain a certain fancy and came to be written upon exclusively by some writers in Sanskrit as well as the vernaculars. As the Rasamañjarī is the basic text on which the Śrngāramañjarī bases itself, we shall deal with its classification in a separate section later where we shall examine it in the light of the criticisms in the Śrngāramañjarī.

Besides the Rasamañjarī, Bhānudatta compiled an anthology called the Rasapārijāta² where he gives in sections IV and V (pp 34-51) the titles of the Nāyikā and Nāyaka varieties followed by illustrative verses. The only additions here not found in the Rasamañjarī are a fresh Abhisārikā-variety called Durdinābhisārikā, one that ventures out in the rains, and the four classes of women Padminī etc, which we find the Śrngāramañjarī including in its scope.

As has already been mentioned once, the subject of Nāyikā-classification attained some importance in the hands of the Vaiṣṇava poets and rhetoricians who had to deal with it in connection with their description of Kṛṣṇa and love towards him as the supreme Nāyaka. As an example of this class we may notice the Ujjvalanīlamanī³ of Rūpa Gosvāmin (1150 A.D.), which is in fact the most leading text on the rhetoric of divine Śrngāra as elaborated by the school of Caitanya, other works like the Alankārakaustubha⁴ (pp 181-197) of Kavīkarnapūra Gosvāmin (1575 A.D.) generally follow the Ujjvalanīlamanī. According to Rūpa, there is no Sāmānyā in Kṛṣṇa-ratī, even a woman like the Sairandhrī being considered as included in the Parakīyā Therefore the basic classes of Nāyikās here are only two, Svakīyā and Parakīyā (p. 85) There is no departure on the three sub-classes of Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, but a remark is added here that while some take these sub-classes as applying only to the Svīyā, others apply them to Parakīyā too A new nomenclature is seen in the Māna-varieties under Mugdhā and Madhyā, Mrdvī and Aksamā, Komalā and Karkaśā (pp. 91-95) It is striking that Rūpa glorifies the Madhyā as the most delectable, as in her is to be seen the beauty of the confluence of both innocence and art The distinction into Jyesthā and Kanīsthā is accepted (p. 105) and on Abhisārikā, the view of writers who hold both varieties of abhisarana and abhisāraṇa is followed (p. 107) The eight Avasthā-Nāyikās are divided into two classes, the happy and the sorrow-stricken, hrstāh and khinnāh, the former, characterised by full dress and decoration (Manditāh), comprises the three, Svādhīnapatikā, Vāsakasajjā and Abhisārikā, and the latter, marked by neglect of dress and decoration (Amanditāh), comprises the other five The classification into Uttamā, Madhyamā and Kanīsthā (Adhamā) is accepted and distinguished by the degree of Kṛṣṇa-love. In the Alankāraustubha, however, the last is omitted, and an Atyuttamā is added as the first (p. 182) ¹

The Mandāramaranda campū of Kṛṣṇa Kavi², which carries the author's gloss called Mādhuryarañjanī, has already been mentioned in the section on Bhoja, as a text that notes the rare varieties given in the Śrngāraprakāśa. Besides that, the noteworthy points in Kṛṣṇa Kavi's treatment are his observations that the Sāmānyā and Parakīyā are always Prauḍhā (p. 80), that according to some the eight Avasthās, Svādhīnapatikā etc, do not apply to the Mugdhā, and the inclusion of the classification into Divyā, Adivyā and Divyādivyā (p. 80), which the Śrngāramañjarī rejects, as well as of the other classifications—Padminī etc, Udātā etc, and Kaphilā, Vātalā and Pittalā (by physical constitution) (p. 80).

The Śrngārāmrtalaharī³ of Sāmarāja Dīksita is a work which sometimes defends the position of Bhānudatta According to Sāmarāja, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā have only the Madhyā and Pragalbhā stages (p. 126). Visrabdha-navodhā which both the Rasamañjarī and the Śrngāramañjarī give as the last variety of the Mugdhā, is according to Sāmarāja, taken by some authors to the next stage of Madhyā (p. 127). He does not admit Dhīrā etc. in Mugdhā (p. 128), following the older view, he does not also admit Dhīrā etc. in Parakīyā (p. 129) While giving the twofold division into Jyesthā and Kanīsthā, Sāmarāja records the opinion of some who do not accept them in Mugdhā, and has a long discussion with them (p. 130) Again, he disagrees with those who give a twofold classification, Pracchanna and Prakāśa, for all, as it is absurd to speak of a Pracchanna Svīyā The varieties Guptā, Vīdagdhā, Laksitā, Mudītā, Kulatā and Anuśayānā are all included in Parakīyā; of these Guptā is given two varieties, Vṛtta-surata-gopānā and Vartīsyamāna-surata-gopānā, Vīdagdhā two, Kṛiyā-vīdagdhā and Vāg-vīdagdhā, and Anuśayānā three, Vartamāna-sanketa-sthāna-vighaṭanena, Bhāvi-sanketa-sthānāśaṅkayā and Sva-anadhiṣṭhita-sthānasya bhartur adhiṣṭhānena (pp. 131-2). See Śrngāramañjarī pp. 8-12. Real love is admitted in Sāmānyā in cases like Vasantasenā. Māna is, as already noted, denied in Parakīyā (p. 134). Some writers are said to opine that the Mugdhā does not have the eight Avasthā-types (p. 136). Āgamīsyat-patikā, i.e., a Prositapatikā whose husband is known to be returning, is included in Vāsakasajjā, even as in the Śrngāramañjarī. We find the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā or the Āgata-patikā included in the same Vāsakasajjā. Both varieties of Abhisārikā are given, and Pravasyatpatikā is included in Proṣita-patikā

Tripāthi Śivarāma, a writer of the beginning of the 18th century, touches upon this subject in his Naksatramālā¹ and deals with it fully in his Rasaratnahāra² In the former he illustrates a few of the Nāyaka-Nāyikā-varieties. In the latter, he systematically criticises the definitions of the Nāyikās given in the Rasamañjarī On Dhīra etc., Śivarāma records the view (śl 19) that they pertain only to the Svīyā according to the ancients and to Parakīyā also according to the recent writers. The most noteworthy point in the Rasaratnahāra is, however, Śivarāma's mention (p. 127), in the commentary, of two additional Nāyikā-types, one of which is similar in name to the Sabhayā found in the Nāṭakalaksanaratnakośa, Śivarāma gives her name as Gurujanabhītā, and from the illustration, whose meaning, however, is not clear, she seems to be a variety of the unchaste Parakīyā The other additional type given by Śivarāma is the Bhujangabhītā; its illustration is again obscure, but it seems to mean one afraid of a womanizer

Viśveśvara, the well-known Ālankārika of the beginning of the 18th century, has written a treatise on Rasa called Rasacandīkā³ the first part of which is devoted to this subject The author follows the Sāhityadarpana and takes some material from Bharata too but his definitions are cast in the Navya-nyāya style of which he gives us a great deal in his Ālankārakaustubha. Viśveśvara too, like Sāmarāja, mentions the view that, according to some, the Vīrabdhā-navodhā is to be brought under the Madhyā, but gives his opinion in favour of calling the Madhyā, Atīvīrabdhā-navodhā (p 5). Dhīrā etc. are held to be applicable to Madhyā and Pragalbhā only (p 6), but the view of the ancients that Dhīrā etc. pertain only to Svīyā (pp 7-8) is recorded. It is strange to note that he illustrates Kanyakā by an unchaste girl who marries and continues her love for the paramour of her maiden days He gives no subvarieties under Sāmānyā The threefold classification found in the Rasamañjarī, Anyā-sambhoga-dukhītā, Vakrokti-garvitā and Mānavatī, which most other writers reproduce, is given by Viśveśvara too, but in view of the criticism of this separate classification in the Śrngāramañjarī, it is interesting to see Viśveśvara saying that authoritative writers have not mentioned this classification. It is true that older works do not mention such a separate classification. Again, like the author of the Śrngāramañjarī, he too rejects the classification into Divyā etc On another point also which most later writers reproduce from the Avaloka, viz., that the two varieties of Parakīyā have only three of the eight Avasthās, Vīrahotkanthā, Abhisaraṇa and Vipralambha, Viśveśvara is critical, he does not accept that view (p 18). On the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās, he reproduces Bharata (p 19). While dealing with Khanditā again, from which he does not consider the Mānavatī as different, he says that standard writers did not give the classification-group Mānavatī etc. (p. 24) It may be seen that Śrngāramañjarī also adopts the same critical attitude towards this separate classification group (p 15) In the Śrngāramañjarī there is a needlessly long discussion on Prosita-patīkā, the grammar of the ktānta Prosita, and the explanation of how the two other cases of the Pravāsa to be and the Pravāsa taking place (bhāvi and vartamāna) must be included in it. Viśveśvara solves this question easily by defining the Prositapatīkā as one unhappy as a result of Pravāsa-jñāna, the knowledge of her lord's journey (pp. 26-7). On Abhisārikā again, he exhibits his critical outlook by holding the causative ñic in 'abhisārayati' as non-significant, and consequently gives only one variety of the Abhisārikā (abhisaratī) (p. 28). In the classification-group, Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā, he says that it is the last to which the name Candī is applied

Nāyaka

Regarding the Nāyaka and the various kinds into which Bharata classifies man, it has already been mentioned that the basic threefold classification into Uttama, Madhyama and Adhama applies to him also. In XXII. 285-302, after dealing with the eightfold classification of the Nāyikā, Bharata speaks of two sevenfold classifications of the Nāyaka. When lovers meet there are seven modes in which the lady, if in endearment, addresses her lover, and seven other modes in which she addresses him, if she is in anger. The seven addresses showing love and regard are Priya, Kānta, Vinīta, Nātha, Svāmin, Jīvita and Nandana, the seven addresses showing her displeasure towards him for his behaviour are Duśśīla, Durācāra, Śātha, Vāma, Vikatthana, Nīrlajja and Nīsthura.

समागमेऽथ नारीणां वाच्यानि मदनाश्रये ।
 प्रियेषु वचनानीह यानि तानि निबोधत ॥
 प्रियः कान्तो विनीतश्च नाथः स्वाभ्यथ जीवितम् ।
 नन्दनश्चैत्यभिप्रेतो (ते) वचनानि भवन्ति हि ॥
 दुःशीलोऽथ दुराचारः शठो वामो विकृत्यनः ।
 निर्लज्जो निष्ठुरश्चेति प्रियं क्रोधेऽभिनिर्दिशेत् ॥

Though these are, to begin with, mentioned as modes of addresses in endearment or anger, the definition of each is set forth in such a manner as to give the impression that each is a type by himself; and it is in the midst of these that we find 'Śātha', a clear type-name in later literature. Priya or the dear one is he who does not do anything unpleasant nor say anything improper and is absolutely straight in his conduct, Kānta or the lovable one is he who bears no mark on any part of his body of his contact with another woman, Vinīta or the docile is one who though irritated, does not reply or speak anything harsh to the beloved, Nātha or the guardian is he who wishes her good, is capable of protecting her, gets neither angry nor intolerant, and is alert in all matters contributing to her pleasure, Svāmin or the lord is one who attends to her with kind words, gifts, objects of enjoyment, fondles and protects her,¹ Jīvita, whom the lady would accost 'my life', is one who, with an understanding of her mind and desires, makes himself an accomplished bed-mate, Nandana, the noble son, is one born of a respectable family, firm in mind, adept, considerate, and considered by her friends as a praiseworthy partner. It may be seen that all these have application to the type called Svādhīna-patikā.

Of persons who cause anger and resentment in the beloved by their misbehaviour, Duśśīla, the bad character, is one who is severe, intolerant, angry, audacious, boastful and unsteady in mind, Durācāra, one of bad habits, is he who speaks harshly and punishes the beloved by tying her up or beating, Śātha, the rogue, talks sweetly to her but does not act up, Vāma, the obstinate, is he who does just the things that he is asked not to do; Vikatthana, the braggart, is he who bears the marks of another woman's contact, boasts of his being a women's favourite, thinks much of himself and is haughty, Nīrlajja, the shameless, bears the irritating signs of another woman's contact and yet approaches his lady, despite the latter's prevention, Nīsthura, the brute, is he who approaches his lady with all the marks of his misbehaviour with another, does not pause to pacify the offended beloved and wants forcibly to enjoy her company too. Among the Nāyaka-types given in later books, besides the Śātha described here, we have the Dhṛṣṭa who corresponds to Bharata's Nīrlajja; in fact, the later Dhṛṣṭa comprehends all the four, Vāma, Vikatthana,

तथाभूदस्माकं प्रथममविभक्ता तनुरिय ततो नु त्वं प्रेयान् वयमपि हताशाः प्रियतमाः ।

इदानीं नाथस्त्वं वयमपि कलत्रं किमपर मयातं प्राणानां कुलिशकठिनानां फलमिदम् ॥

On the gradual loss of romance which affects the transition of the Parakīyā kanyā to the Svīyā, see also the verse यः कौमारहरः quoted on p. 8 of the Śrngāramañjarī.

Nirlajja and Nisthura of Bharata It may also be noted that in Bharata's detailed descriptions of these fourteen kinds of favourable and unfavourable men, there occur expressions like Daksina (verse 294) and Dhrsta (verse 296) which later become settled type-names

As he opens his next chapter (XXIII), Bharata gives us the Nāyaka-type called Vaiśika, one specialising in the company of courtezans, which persists as a major Nāyaka-type in later classification

वेद्योचरणाद्वापि वैशिकस्स उदाहृतः ।

After describing him in the next verse as an adept in the arts and in captivating a woman's heart, Bharata speaks of thirty-three qualities of his, natural and cultivated (verses 3-7).

In the same chapter, Bharata speaks of another classification of men into five kinds in respect of their activities towards pleasing the beloved, Catura, Uttama, Madhyama, Adhama and Pravrttaka or Sampravrttaka Catura or the clever is he who can put up with sorrow and difficulties, is pleasant in looks, and adept in courting and pacifying the lady in anger; in the Kasi edn. definition, he is one who shares the lady's sorrow and difficulty and is an adept in bringing her round when she is in Pranaya-kalaha The Uttama, Madhyama and Adhama, a basic classification that can be applied to any other classification also, is taken here and explained thus Uttama or the best is, like the Priya described earlier, one who does nothing unpleasant, is self-possessed and dignified, talks sweetly, has no anger (Amānī), knows the heart and does not forget Another type of Uttama is he who has a sweet disposition, is liberal, does not lose himself in love, and can give up the love when the woman slights him.¹ Madhyama is one who, without much enthusiasm, tries to know and captivate the woman's heart, and gives up his love the moment some misunderstanding crops up. Another kind of Madhyama, found in the Kasi edn and missing from the K M. edn. is defined as one who shows his liberality on occasions, does not become very much upset when he is slighted, but detaches himself the moment he finds her unfaithful Adhama or the low type is he who courts despite insult, and goes on loving the lady even when her infidelity is known and friends dissuade him Pravrttaka or Sampravrttaka (Sampravrddha according to Kasi edn) is a further degenerate type, devoid of fear, anger, sense of shame and firmness, a mere plaything of women It is to be noted that all these five are given as varieties of the Vaiśika-nāyaka

The characteristics of Uttama, Madhyama and Adhama given here may be compared with those given in the Śrngāramañjarī in the section on Uttamā etc. (p. 51). The Catura mentioned here is also found in later works (see Śrngāramañjarī, p. 49), but all these have been preserved not as varieties of the Vaiśika-nāyaka, but as general varieties applying to all kinds of Nāyakas

In ch XXIV, Bharata gives the fourfold classification of the hero into Dhīroddhata, Dhīralalita, Dhīrodātta, and Dhīraprasānta, which is the main classification accepted in works of dramaturgy, but left out in works on erotics on the Nāyaka-Nāyikā varieties.

After mentioning the three classes of Nāyikās accepted by him, and the additional ones suggested by others (I. 5 3-27), Vātsyāyana says that Nāyaka, however, is only one, applying to all kinds of Nāyikās (I. 5.28). Immediately he speaks of the Pracchanna-nāyaka, the secret paramour (I 5. 29) which can refer only to the Upapatī later defined as the second main class of the Nāyaka and figuring in Parakiyā-love In IV. 4 85, Vātsyāyana requires a man with many wives to be Sama, which would correspond to the later Daksina-type. In V. 45, where the clever messenger (Dūtī) is instructed to induce from the stand taken by the Rasamañjarī, accepts the Mānī and Catura as separate varieties not included in the Śāṭha (p. 49), and following the Āmoda, gives in addition to the Prosita, the Amīlita and the Virahin (p. 51) as constituting another threefold classification of the Nāyaka; the Amīlita is the hero in Pūrvānurāga or Ayoga-vipralambha; the Virahin is the type corresponding to the Virahotkanthitā.

It is interesting to find that the post-Bhānudatta anthology, the Padyaracanā of *Lakṣmaṇa*¹ (section XI), gives, besides the Mānī and the Catura (Vidagdha), the Anabhijñā, and what is more, adds two more in this last category, the Śīśu and the Vrddha Lakṣmaṇa also illustrates a Deśāntaropagata, one returned from travel, corresponding to the Nāyikā Avasitapravāsapatikā or the Āgatabhartrkā, as the Sundaraśṛṅgāra calls her, this Bhānudatta gives in his anthology Rasapārijāta (p. 73).

Viśveśvara includes the Mānī and Catura not in the Śāṭha, as others are said to do according to the Rasamañjarī and Śṛṅgāramañjarī, but in the Madhyama and Uttama respectively (Rasacandrikā, p. 37). He rejects the Anabhijñā also as Rasābhāsa (p. 38). Quoting from Bharata, Viśveśvara mentions not only the threefold classification Uttama etc., (pp. 30-31), but also the fivefold classification into Catura, Uttama, Madhyama, Adhama and Sampravṛttaka (pp. 35-36), but considers the latter superfluous, as Catura could be brought under Uttama, Pravṛttaka under Adhama, and Uttama, etc. have already been recognised as a main scheme of classification.

Tripāthī Śivarāma, author of the Rasaratnahāra, gives the Mānī and Catura as two sub-varieties of the Śāṭha. In his Śṛṅgārāmṛtalaharī, Sāmarāja Dīkṣita includes the Mānī and Catura in Śāṭha, rejects the Anabhijñā as Rasābhāsa, gives the Prosita, and mentions that the classification Uttama etc. pertains only to the Vaiśika.

Padmīnī, Citrinī, Śaṅkhinī and Hastinī

The author of the Śṛṅgāramañjarī says at the beginning, when he sets forth his method of treatment and the topics to be dealt with by him, that one of the special features of his work is the description of the varieties of women called Padmīnī etc., which the previous treatises on the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā enumerated by him earlier do not deal with (pūrvoktagrantha-avarṇita-padmīnyādījātayaḥ—p. 2). Accordingly, at the end of the work (pp. 54-55), he speaks of these four classes of women. He says that so far he has been dealing with the varieties of Nāyikās as dealt with in the Rasamañjarī on the basis of different kinds of moods and reactions in love and that now he would deal with a classification of both Nāyikā and Nāyaka by guṇas, following the views of Vātsyāyana (etāvat-paryantam Rasamañjary-anusāreṇa cestā-viśeṣa-bhedena nāyikābheda nirūpitāḥ; idānim Vātsyāyana-matānusāreṇa guṇaiḥ hastinyādī-nāyikā-bhedāḥ bhadiādī-nāyaka-bhedāśca nirūpyante, p. 54). The gunas meant are natural features of both body and mind, and what these are in particular we shall see later. Vātsyāyana here does not mean the author of that name who wrote the Kāmasūtras; we have to understand by the word Vātsyāyana-mata, i. e., Kāmāsāstra in general, which is not an unusual meaning. For, the Kāmasūtras themselves do not speak of this fourfold classification of women, nor of a corresponding classification of men, such as the one mentioned in the Śṛṅgāramañjarī. Vātsyāyana's threefold classification of men and women from the point of view of the nature of the male sexual feature,² Śāśa, Vṛsa and Aśva (the rabbit, the bull and the horse) and the Mrgī, Badavā and Hastinī (the doe, the mare and the she-elephant), is different; Hastinī is found as a type-name here too, but it has as little to do with the Hastinī in the fourfold classification we are now considering as the Hastinī which, as we saw above, Bharata mentions among the numerous classes of women described by him,

² Kāmasūtra II. 1. 1, 2ff. But some texts speak of four such classes, adding a Mrga to

The earliest Kamaśāstra text now known to deal with this fourfold classification of women is the Ratirahasya of Kokkoka, where these four classes are introduced as not dealt with by Vātsyāyana, but dealt with by Nandikeśvara (tātra prathamam Nandikeśvara-Gonikāputrayor matam ādyam samgrahisyāmah, parato Vātsyāyanīyam. Yad Vātsyāyana-sūtra-sangraha-bahirbhūtam kimapyāgame dṛṣtam etc Padminīm tadanu citrinīm tatah etc ch. 1 śl 9 ff, and Samksepad itī Nandikeśvara-matāt tattvam kimapyuddhrtam goniputraka-bhāṣito'yam adhunā samksipyate vistarah ch 2 śl.5.) Following the Ratirahasya, which later gained equal, if not greater, popularity with Vātsyāyana's Sūtras, almost all the Kāmaśāstra works described these four types of women Padminī etc But works on Rasa dealing with the Nāyaka-Nāyikā subject never included this classification, which they considered as more proper in works of Kāmaśāstra. The Āmoda on the Rasamañjarī says. पद्मिनीचित्रिणीशङ्खिनीहस्तिन्यादिभेदाः कलाशास्त्रप्रसिद्धा इत्यत्र नोक्ताः । Adyar Ms. p 283 The reason for the author of the Śrngāramañjarī including these four classes also in his work is, on the one hand, his desire for elaboration and showing of some special features in his work, and on the other, the example of some of the Hindi works on the subject which include a treatment of these four types of women, two of which are mentioned by the author among his sources, the Sundaraśrngāra deals with Padminī etc ¹

Bhadra, Datta, Kūcu(-r-)māra, and Pāñcāla

The author of the Śrngāramañjarī mentions four male types corresponding to the four female types discussed above. He says that as the characteristics of the Nāyaka types, Bhadra, Datta, Kūcumāra and Pāñcāla do not differ from those of Hastinī, Citrinī, Śankhinī and Padminī, he is not giving separate illustrations for the former.

the Saśa, Vrsa and the Aśva given by Vātsyāyana and what is more, equate these four with the four female types, Padminī etc. See Smaradīpikā, Madras Ms R. 3357 (c) p. 61.—

The Kāmapurusārthasamgaraha, which I shall have occasion to quote again below, says:

A Ratīśāstra printed with Hindi and English translation (printed also in Bengali), cast in the form a dialogue between Śiva and Pārvatī, which is identical with the Ratīśāstra, ascribed to a Nāgārjuna and partially printed by R Schmidt in the Vienna Oriental Journal (Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, XXIII. pp. 180f.) says.

What are these four male types? Their history is rather intriguing and deserves to be set forth here with as much detail as can be gleaned for the present from works of Kāmasāstra, in print as well as manuscript. Kūcumāra and Pāñcāla, as we have already pointed out while dealing with the works and authors figuring in the Śrngāramañjarī, are two old pre-Vātsyāyana writers on Kāmasāstra, the former is our authority on aupaniśadika dealt with in the closing section of the Kāmasūtras, the use of special appliances and methods, aphrodisiac, mantras and other means of attraction and heightening of enjoyment, all of which, called Kaucumārā yogāh, constitute one of the sixty-four arts enumerated by Vātsyāyana as ancillary subjects (angavidyās) of Kāmasāstra (I 3 16), a separate treatise on this subject, called Kūcimāra tantra, is also known¹ Pāñcāla is Bābhavya, who epitomised in seven sections the five hundred chapters of Śvetaketu's work (Vātsyāyana I 1 9-13), and the elaboration of the several stages and aspects of sexual enjoyment into sixty-four items is called Pāñcālikī catussasṭi after Bābhavya Pāñcāla who did it (Vātsyāyana I 3. 17-19 and II 2 1-5.)

The names of the two other Nāyakas are somewhat obscure. While we cannot be very definite about it, we may suppose that as the two names discussed above are after two old writers, these two others, Bhadra and Datta, may also signify two old Kāmasāstra authorities. Datta, in that case, may stand for Dattaka who, Vātsyāyana says (I. 1 11) elaborated separately the chapter on Vaiśika for the sake of the courtezans of Pātaliputra.² Dattaka's Sūtras on this special branch are also known from references and quotations in the Bhāṇas of Sūdraka, Śyāmilaka and Īśvaradatta, and was, according to an inscription³, commented upon by the Western Ganga king, Mādhavavarman II (1st half of the 3rd century A.D.)⁴ Of Bhadra, we are not in a position to say even this much.

In none of the early or authoritative and popular Sanskrit Kāmasāstra works is this fourfold classification of Nāyaka into Bhadra etc. found. So far as I have been able to find, the only works that mention these four classes are the Śrngārādīpikā Ratirahasya⁵ of Harihara, son of Rāma (15th cent. A.D.) and the encyclopædia Śivatattvaratnākara of Basavarāja⁶ (A.D. 1709). Though this classification is rare in Sanskrit works and appears only in some late works, like the two mentioned above, it seems to have been well-known in Telugu literature, and in Kannaḍa too to some extent. There is a verse in the Kumārasambhava of Nannī Coda⁷ (mid. 12th cent. A.D.), in canto eight, in which a Veśyā Nāyikā says that she would have none of the four Nāyakas, Bhadra, Pāñcāla, Dattaka and Kūcimāra, for each of them has his drawback, the first, excess of dalliance and sport, (śrngārāṭicestā), the second, too fine and delicate a manner of drawing out the sentiment, the third, trying to purchase company by money, and the fourth using magic and medicine without giving the heart, and she wants a real lover free from all these flaws. According to Sri M. Ramakrishna Kavi who has a note on the question, 'Who is Bhadra¹, the Kannaḍa treatise on erotics, Madanatīlaka of Candrarāja, (c. 1025 A.D.), refers to these four types in a verse of eulogy on Candrarāja, according to this verse, Bābhaviya or Pāñcāla is over zealous, Atīlola, and Bhadra is angry. Sri M. R. Kavi quotes in the same place a verse from the Haramekhalā and says that Bhadra is Mūladeva, the well-known social hero, who figures in many stories and was an authority on Kāmasāstra and worldly matters². It is significant that like the Śrngāramañjarī, the two works Śrngāradīpikā Ratirahasya and the Śivatattvaratnākara which mention this classification are works produced in the Deccan and South India under the influence of Telugu and Kannada literature. We noted above that, according to the Śrngāramañjarī, these four male types are not different in characteristics from the four female types, Hastinī etc. This is exactly the view expressed in Harihara's Śngāradīpikā

भद्रो दत्तः कूचिमारः पाञ्चालः पुरुषाः स्मृताः ॥

(ZDMG 1903 p 721)

Earlier, while describing the woman types, Hastinī etc., Harihara says (pp. 719-720):

एवं लक्षणसंपन्ना हस्तिनी कामिनी भवेत् । तां भद्रजातिपुरुषो यमेतानङ्गवेदवित् ॥

This equation of the female and male types Hastinī-Bhadra, Citrinī-Datta, Śankhinī-Kūcumāra and Padminī-Pāñcāla agrees with that given in the Śrngāramañjarī, But Basavarāja not only gives the equation differently but also calls the Datta by a different animal name, Haya, according to his Śivatattvaratnākara (VI 12 verses 26-27), Citrinī and Bhadra go together, Hastinī and Haya (Datta) are equal mates, Śankhinī and Kūcumāra form an ideal pair and Padminī finds her proper companion in the Pāñcāla. Basava's definition of these male types is brief and restricted as in the case of Vātsyāyana's Śāśa etc. to the nature of the physical sexual feature of the male

This equation of these four male types with the four female types Hastinī etc. is itself due to loss of tradition regarding their real significance, but in the period later than that of the above-noted works, these four male types were much less understood ; Śiva-rāmakavi, author of the Telugu Kāmakalāśāstra, (Madras Ms. R. 320) allows absolute scope to his imagination in his description of these four types. Dantalūri Nārāyana Rāju Gajapati, in his Sanskrit compilation Kāmapuraṣārthasangraha¹ had to face the fact that besides these four male types, there were the three given by Vātsyāyana, Śaśa etc., he found that, as in Basava's work, Bhadra etc. were also defined in terms of the features by which Śaśa etc. are defined by Vātsyāyana, so he mechanically harmonised the texts by adopting for the four male types Śaśa, Mṛga, Vṛsa and Haya² alternate names Pāñcāla, Kūcumāra, Datta and Bhadra (Śasaka eva Pāñcālah, Mrgah Kūcumāra itī nāmāntaram; Vṛsabham Datta itī ca vadanti, Hayo Bhadra itī bruvanti).

Śārngadhara, in his Paddhati (section 92; pp. 446-8, śls 3091-3108) extracts from an otherwise unfamiliar Śrīdhara, evidently a Kāmaśāstra writer, on the subject of the Nāyikās Śrīdhara takes the varieties of women named by Bharata after gods, demigods, animals etc., but what is strange is that he picks out four from this series and equates them with the four varieties Padminī etc. Thus, in this scheme Devī is equated with Padminī, Apsaras with Citrinī, Yaksinī with Śaṅkhinī and Rākṣasī with Hastinī. The equation is clearly prompted by the general idea that Padminī is the best type, Citrinī the next best is noted for artistic accomplishment, and Hastinī is the most undesirable specimen, but even such a justification cannot be found for equating the Yaksinī and Śaṅkhinī.

Getting beyond these imaginary descriptions and fanciful equations, we can reconstruct to some extent the real and original significance of these names Bhadra etc., if we collate together the facts known about the Kāmaśāstra writers after whom they are named and the references in Nanni Coda's Kumārasambhava which is an early text among works noticed above on this topic. Dattaka specialised in the art of love as practised by courtezans and wrote for them his Sūtras; Nanni Coḍa says that the Datta-type threw money and courted women; from these data it is possible to say that Datta is the Nāyaka type called Vaiśika. Kūcumāra is well-known as the authority on the use of the sexual aids of medicine and magic; and Nanni Coda's remark only confirms this. Pāñcāla's speciality is the "Catussasti", the adeptness in the soft execution of the sexual act, stage by stage, from embrace onwards, the Veśyā in Nanni Coda's work referring to him as drawing out the process in too delicate a manner confirms this. Regarding Bhadra alone, we are in some difficulty, as we have to start and end with Nanni Coḍa's sole reference for finding out his speciality; as already noted, Nanni Coda characterises him by excess of dalliance and sport, śṛṅgārāticestā.

Before we can say whether on the basis of these characteristics, these four male types could be equated with the four female types Hastinī etc., we have to determine precisely the significance of the latter. Their descriptions in the several texts, though they proceed on the same lines, are not uniform in the details. Starting with Ratirahasya, we shall compare their definitions in the other texts and note the additional and different details introduced in the latter.

Considerate.	1st, 2nd, 4th 5th days of the fortnight, generally she has no great pleasure in nocturnal enjoyment, even during day, and even the touch of her babe, gives her the thrill, elaborate candakalā details given
Pañcasāyaka.	No additional or different particulars.
Śṛṅgārādūpikā.	Adds some more items of beauty re. teeth etc.	Eschews bad company, firm and good	Loves pearl ornaments and sweet dishes.
Śṛṅgāramañjarī.	No additional or different details.

The above tabular analysis shows that the details regarding these four female types given in the Śrngāramañjarī show close relation to those given in Harihara's Śrngāradīpikā. The statement in the Śrngāramañjarī regarding the mixed type 'hastinyādīnāyikāsu parasparaguna-sānkaryena jāti-sankarāḥ striyo jāyante' (p 59), which echoes the following in the Śrngāradīpikā हस्तिन्यादिगुणा यत्र वर्तन्ते सङ्करा भुवि । सा सङ्करा बहुज्ञेया—॥ (śl 22), shows further that our author has used Harihara's work.

The table would also show us that all the elaboration of the characteristics of each of these four types centres round a nuclear idea, which we can analyse easily. The Padminī, it is easy to see, is the best type of woman and the elaboration of her features is all based on this single idea of her being the best type and being comparable to the lotus, her leading characteristic is not only beauty but delicateness. Citrinī comes next in point of merit; her chief feature is her accomplishment and variety of tastes and flashy behaviour, all further elaboration is based on this and on the word citra meaning 'manifold' and 'striking'. Śankhinī, it would appear, is not so easy to be analysed to her essential characteristic, but a careful scrutiny would show that we have to underline the statement in the Ratirahasya and other texts that her nerves and veins are visible on her frame, that she is devoid of flesh, and that her body is full of hollows. To this is to be added the feature that she does not moisten easily, nor is she, as the Pāñcasāyaka says, easy to be enjoyed. As Śankha means shell and bone, she is to be understood as the fleshless woman, hard in touch and hard of enjoyment. Hastinī by all description stands lowest in the order, she is, as her name suggests, the heavy corpulent type.

It is not very easy to adjust to these four female types of such characteristics, the four male types Bhadra etc. We might yet try to understand if there is some appropriateness in the equation. The Citrinī, being the artistically accomplished woman, of variegated tastes, is the type to which courtezans as a class would answer, so, the assignment of the Dattaka type of man to Citrinī may be significant. The Pāñcāla is the artist par excellence in the delicate execution of the act of enjoyment and it would similarly appear significant to associate him with the Padminī, the delicate woman. As Kūcumāra is an adept in the matter of inducing love and augmenting it by various medicinal and other means, he may be paired off with the hard Śankhinī from whom it is difficult to derive pleasure. The Hastinī is a highly passionate type making heavy demands on the part of the lover and only the Bhadra who can, as Nannī Coda says, indulge in Śrngāra-aticeṣṭā, excessive dalliance and sport, could possibly be her mate.

The Accomplices of the Nāyikā and Nāyaka

Works of the class to which the Śrngāramañjarī belongs deal regularly with the accomplices who help the lovers in their love, and treatises of larger scope on Śrngāra Rasa or dramaturgy also speak of them. After dealing with the Vaiśika-hero and his thirty-three qualities, and his friend (XXIII. 8), Bharata gives a number of women who could be employed by the lovers as their messengers: Pratīveśyā, Sakhī, Dāsī, Kumārī, Kāru, Śilpinī, Dhātṛī, Pāṣandī and Īksanikā, the neighbour-woman, the female-friend, the servent-woman, the little girl, the artisan and artiste ladies, the nurse, the heretic woman and the fortune teller (verse 4). An additional verse in the Kasi edn (XXV. 9) mentions the learned lady (Vijñāna-guna-sampannā), story-teller (Kathanī),¹ one in disguise (Līnginī), actress (Rangopajīvanā) and the lady who is an adept in understanding (Pratīpatī-vicaksanā). Most of these are retained in later texts. After pointing out in a verse what kinds of men or women are not to be employed as messengers, Bharata sets forth the various acts which these messengers are to do, a topic dealt with in later texts under the heading Dūtīkarman. The acts mentioned by Bharata are Protsāhana

1. The Abhinavabhāratī which has this verse says कथनी बृहत्कथादिलम्बतर्कण (१) कुशला p. 60, Madras Ms R. 2785.

(enthusing the lovers), Anurāga-anukīrtana (conveying the love of one to the other), Yathokta-Kathana (truthful report of the message), Bhāva-pradarśana (conveying the desire of one to the other), Kula-bhoga-dhanādivikāthana (extolling the pedigree and other merits of one to the other), Kārya-nivedana (information of what is to be done) and Artha-bhāsa (speaking of the relevant issues) (verses 12-13). Again, she is to arrange through various means the union of the lover with the lady in fresh love and also pacify the elder Nāyikā when she becomes angry (verse 14), she is generally to study and grasp the mind of lovers (verse 17).

Of the male aids who help the hero, Bharata mentions in ch. XXIV, the Vita, eloquent, considerate, literary, pleasant, resourceful and expert in the art of attending to the courtesan (verse 104), the Vidūsaka, the clown (106) who is the same as the friend, Vayasya, described in XXIII 8 as devoted, pure, clever and so on; and the Ceta who is fond of the arts, speaks much and knows the comparative importance of men, from the expression Gandhasevaka here, it would appear he was to help the hero in his toilette and was thus a miscellaneous attender upon the hero ¹ It may be noted that the Pīthamarda, so regularly mentioned in later works with the Vita, Ceta and Vidūsaka is not mentioned by Bharata here ²

The Kāmasūtras, by the very nature of their subject-matter, afford greater scope to the subject of accomplices used for the furtherance of love-affairs; they are particularly necessary, and in a large variety, in Pāradārīka love. References to them and the part to be played by them are profuse in Vātsyāyana In I 3 15, Vātsyāyana mentions the Dhātreyī (nurse's daughter), Sakhī (friend), Savayāh mātṛsvasā (mother's sister who is of equal age), Vṛddhadāsī (old servant), Bhikṣukī (mendicant woman known already) and Svasā (one's own sister) as persons from whom a girl can take lessons on love I 4 48, in the context of accomplices, speaks of Bhikṣukīs, Kalā-vidagdḥās (artistes), Mundās (widows), Vṛsalīs (prostitutes or low caste women) and Vṛddha-gamkās (superannuated courtesans) In IV. 1. 9, where chaste wedded women are warned against bad characters who serve as agents of temptation, Śramanā, Kṣapaṇā (heretic mendicant women), Kuhakā (woman magician), Īksanikā (fortune-teller) and Mūla-kārikās (those that deal in enticing drugs) are mentioned In Pāradārīka, a special section is devoted to Dūta-karman (V.4). In V. 4 42 here, in addition to some already mentioned, the Tāpasī (the woman recluse) is also given V. 4 44 classifies Dūtīs into eight kinds Of these the first three, Nīrṣṭārtha, Parimitārtha and Patrahāraka, are distinguished by the extent of authority as emissary vested in them and are parallel to the Dūtas of the same names figuring in Aithaśāstra Generally speaking, later works on erotics or the rhetoric of love have not taken them up, though an exhaustive work like Bhoja's Śṛṅgāra Prakāśa or one like the Ujjvalanīlamani of Rūpa Gosvāmin speaks of them Of the other five, Svayamdūtī is to be specially noted, for while this type, which is found in later works, is always defined as the lady in love, who acts as her own messenger and arranges for union with her lover, Vātsyāyana defines her differently. In V. 4 53-55, Vātsyāyana describes her elaborately and in two different ways, in the first variety, she is a messenger sent by another lady, but herself begins to woo that lover, thus approaching the Dūtī of the Nāyikā-variety called Dūtī-sambhoga-duhkhītā in the class Anya-sambhoga-duhkhītā under the Khanditā-type. The second variety described by Vātsyāyana approaches the Svayamdūtī of later texts, with this

1. He was of a servant-status, a Nīca-pātra as mentioned in the chapter on gait on the stage, gati-pracāra. (XIII. 145, Kasi edn.) See also the Sthāvaraka ceta in the Mṛcchakatika, where he acts also as the cart-driver.

2. Elsewhere also, in the chs. "speaking of gait, dress etc of the different characters (gati-pracāra, āhārya, etc.) where Vita, Vidūsaka and Ceta are mentioned, the Pīthamarda is not found.

difference that, according to Vātsyāyana, she should approach the object of her love as a messenger of another Nāyikā, fictitious or real, and if the Nāyikā for whom she pretends to be the messenger is real, she should try to undermine her relations with him. Bhoja, in his Śrngāra Prakāśa, as we shall see below, makes this second variety a separate Dūtī called Chadmadūtī Mūdhadūtī, the next, is the innocent girl-wife of the lover to whom the Parakīyā or the Veśyā is attached. Bhānyādūtī is one's own half-witted wife whom the lover employs as a messenger Mūkadūtī is of two kinds, Bālā the little girl and Paricārikā the servant, both of them moving about or going to the lover may be made to carry consciously or unconsciously a secret letter or sign of love hidden in the garland or ear-ornaments; in some later texts, the little girl who is innocent of matters of love (ajñāta-manmatha-vikāra bālā) is mentioned as a regular messenger. Vātadūtī is another unconscious messenger, who conveys an enigmatic utterance or a double entendre which the lover alone understands, here the Jayamangalā adds that according to the Bābhravīyas, even animals, birds, dolls and paintings could, in this manner, be employed as media of message Bhoja not only mentions birds etc., but adds four more to the eight Dūtīs mentioned by Vātsyāyana in this class

Of the opposite numbers on the male side, Vātsyāyana mentions an equal variety of accomplices In I 4 44-46, he speaks of persons described by the Jayamangalā as Upanāgarakas, the minor men about town, who attach themselves to the main Nāgarakas, the Nāyakas, and live by serving them in the advancement of their love-affairs. The chief among them, whom Vātsyāyana characterises in I. 4 47, as the ministers of war and peace between the courtezans and their lovers, are given by him as the Pīthamarda, Vita and Vidūsaka. The second and third, we have seen in Bharata too, but in Vātsyāyana, we miss Bharata's Ceta, but find instead a Pīthamarda. In I 5.35-37, Vātsyāyana analyses these aids on three principles, friendship, qualities and occupation, Sneha, Guṇa and Jāti, all of which, together with the enumerations under each, are taken and amplified by Bhoja in his treatment of Dūtas in the Śrngāra Prakāśa. Here in sūtra 37, we have in addition to the Pīthamarda, Vita and Vidūsaka, the following miscellany drawn from avocations with which lovers in particular and men and women in general come into contact: Rajaka (washerman), Nāpita (barber)¹, Mālākāra, Gāndhika and Saurika (vendors of garlands, perfumes and wine), Bhiksuka (mendicant), Gopālaka (cowherd), Tāmbūhka (vendor of betel) and Sauvarnika (gold-smith). In book V again devoted to courtesan-love, Vātsyāyana has occasion to revert to these aids and mentions (V. 1 8-9) besides those already enumerated in I. 5 37, Āraksaka-purusas (guards and policemen), Dharmādhikaranasthas (those employed in courts of justice), Darvañās (astrologers), Vīkrāntāh Śūrāh (soldiers and brave men of the city), Samāna-vidyās (those interested in the arts of music and dance practiced by courtezans) and kalā-grāhins (those learning these arts from them).

Rudrabhatta's Śrngāratīlaka mentions in II 65 the Kāru, Dāsī, Natī, Dhātrī, Prātiśyā, Śilpinī, Bālā and Pravrajitā as friends who serve as accomplices for women and adds in the next verse their qualifications. Earlier, in I. 29-32, Rudrabhatta speaks of the accomplices of the hero, where we find the Pīthamarda with the Vita and the Vidūsaka, but the Ceta is not to be seen, their qualities are mentioned in I. 29, and their definitions are very briefly given in I 30-31, the Pīthamarda is here defined merely as an attendant on the lover and the beloved. Rudrata, who gives the same three male accomplices, says of Pīthamarda more definitely that he is an 'Anucara' of the hero. While Rudrabhatta mentions the female-accomplices under the heading helpful friends, Śakhī-janah, Dhanañjaya gives them as messengers, Dūtyah, and adds for the first time among such works, the Svayamdūtī (Svam ca—Daśarūpaka II. 29. Svayam dūtī— Avaloka). In II 8-9, Dhanañjaya also mentions the same three accomplices on the hero-side, the Vita, Vidūsaka and the Pīthamarda; it is to be noted that these are dealt with here definitely in relation to their appearance as characters in a play.

Bhoja devotes two full chapters of his Srngāra Prakāśa to Dūtas, Dūtīs and their work (chs XXVIII, XXIX) and I have set forth in detail the information here in my Bhoja's Srngāra Prakāśa, Vol I pp 54-57. These two chapters form an elaborate commentary on the Sūtras of Vātsyāyana on Dūtas, Dūtīs and Dūtakarman, and the Mālatīmādhava which closely follows Vātsyāyana, as it itself says expressly¹, is extensively reproduced here for illustration. The three grounds of classification, Sneha, Guna and Jāti, given by Vātsyāyana are amplified by Bhoja into ten. Jāti,—God, demi-god, human being, monkey, parrot, mina, dove and swan, Guna,—qualities like hereditary ties, faithfulness, selflessness, etc, Kriyā,—associated in activities like playmate from childhood, grateful by reason of former help received, class-mate, one in similar situation and so on; Dravya,—different categories of persons like vendors of garland, betel, perfume and wine, the Pīthamarda, Vita, Vidūsaka, Pāsandins and friends in general, Sambandha, personal relationship like teacher, friend, pupil, servant, oneself, kinsman, son, and younger brother, Artha and Prayojana, the next two principles of classification, are subtly distinguished by Bhoja as an object to be sought after and brought into being and an already existent object the desire for which prompts activity, the classes under these two are not exactly persons serving as messengers but conditions or situations under which messengers have to act; these are, Anartha-pratighāta, Sahārthatā, Prāpti, Pratāraṇa, Ārnya, Kīrti and Prīti; Dayā, Sneha, Kutūhala, Abhiprāyopālambha, Pūrva Prārthanā, Anyataraprārthanā, Śīla and Sanghaisa, Prayoga,—modus operandi, open and secret, low and high, etc, Yogyatā, qualification and status and means employed. It is here that Bhoja adds four more to the eight mentioned by Vātsyāyana in V. 4 44, Nisr̥stārtha, Parimitārtha, Patrahāraka, Svayamdūtī, Mūkadūtī, Mūdhadūtī, Bhāryādūtī, Vāṭadūtī, Chadmadūtī, Vyājadūtī, Mantradūta and Tantradūta; Chadmadūtī is, as already pointed out above, the second variety of Svayamdūtī mentioned by Vātsyāyana, (दूत्यच्छलेन अन्यामतिसन्धाय तस्यास्नेदशक्यनद्वारेण नायकं साधयेत्, ता वोपह्रियात् सा छन्नदूती p 495, Vol III, Madras Ms); the Vyājadūtī is said to adopt a veiled speech (an Anyāpadeśa or Vyājokti) for conveying the message (यान्यव्याजेनान्यमभिधत्ते सा व्याजदूती ibid) and is illustrated by the message of the courtesan in Mālatī's retinue in Act I of the Mālatīmādhava, in which the words referring to the Vakula garland signify really Mādhava himself, the Mantradūta and Tantradūta are persons of supernatural powers who help the lovers with their miracles (ibid p 496), the tenth principle is sex, Strīṭva, and refers to females like Īksanikā Bhiksukī, Sakhī, Dhātreyikā, Vidhavā, Dāsī, Śilpakārikā and Śilpinī. On p 497, ibid a few minor varieties like the doctor and the priest, Vaidya and Vaidika are added, the total number of these messengers is given by Bhoja as 84.

One of these eighty-four requires some special elucidation. Under Sambandha, the fifth class, Bhoja mentions Ātman which refers to the Nāyaka himself, and illustrates this Ātmadūta by Rāvaṇa approaching Sitā in the guise of a sage (आत्मा महर्षिवेषो रावणस्य सीताहरणे p 482, ibid). This would therefore correspond on the male side to the Svayamdūtī included among the messengers on the female side. It should also be noted that Bhoja does not separate the aids as those on the male side and those on the female side. The varieties resulting in the intermixture and inter-application of these ten principles are also worked out and illustrated by Bhoja. A large number of the qualities of messengers is then given with illustration. Twenty-four kinds of Dūta-karman are then enumerated and illustrated in the latter part of ch XXVIII and the whole of the next chapter again is devoted solely to the further elaboration of the messenger's work. Ch V. of Bhoja's shorter work is brief on this subject. The Sarasvatikanthābharana V 121 just mentions the inferior characters (hīna-pātras), Pīthamarda, Vīdūsaka, Vita, Ceta and the Sakhīs, in their brief definitions and illustrations that follow on pp 601-604 (N S Press edn), we meet with the Pīthamarda, Vīdūsaka, Vita, Ceta, and the Sakhī, the last classified into Sahajā, Pūrvajā and Āgantū, the equal, the elder and the occasional friend. As in the Daśarūpaka, here too, these are dealt with as included in dramatic personae.

1. See औद्धत्यमायोजितकामसूत्रम् I. 4 and at the end of the Mīśra Viṣkambha in Act I. तान्निपुणे निस्सृष्टार्थदूतीकल्पः सूत्रयितव्यः ।

In most of the other works noticed previously under Nāyikā and Nāyaka, there is no special addition or omission to be noted on the subject of the accomplices of the hero and heroine. The Pratāparudriya (I 40 and 55) gives among the Nāyaka-sahāyas both the Pīthamarda and Ceta besides the Vita and the Vīdūsaka, and among the Nāyikā-sahāyas, gives Svā or the Svayamdūtī. The Sāhityadarpana also has the Svayamdūtī (III. 129). Of male accomplices, Viśvanātha mentions all the usual four (III 46). The only difference in the Rasārnavasudhākara is that Śingabhūpāla omits the Svā from the list of Dūtīs (p 37, TSS. edn).

The Rasamañjarī gives all the four male accomplices. On the side of the Nāyikā, Bhānūdatta mentions the friend and the messenger, Sakhī and Dūtī, separately and in general without any classification, but he devotes some attention to the different aspects of their work (karman).

Of the Vaisnava Ālankārikas of Bengal, Kavīkarnapūra Gosvāmin adopts a different and general classification of the friends of Kṛṣṇa and the Gopīs into four main kinds according to the intensity of friendship and intimacy (Preman and Narman). His Ālankāraustubha says that Kṛṣṇa's aids are of four kinds, Sakhā, Priyasakhā, Narmasakhā and Priyanarmasakhā.

साहाय्यस्त्युस्सहचरास्ते भवन्ति चतुर्विधाः ।

सखायश्च प्रियसखाः तथा नर्मसखा अपि ॥

प्रियनर्मसखाश्चान्ये—

V 87-88

Similarly the female aids of the Nāyikās of Kṛṣṇa are Sakhī, Priyasakhī, Narmasakhī and Priyanarmasakhī.

—हृदयज्ञा सखी भवेत् ॥

छायेव यानुसरति सैव प्रियसखी स्मृता ।

सुरसे नर्मणि रता सैव नर्मसखी भवेत् ॥

न संकोच यया याति कान्तेन शयितोत्थिता ।

आत्मनो मूर्तिरन्येव प्रियनर्मसखी तु सा ॥ V 157-9

In his Ujjvalānilamam, Rūpa Gosvāmin gives the male accomplices as five, adding to the four old ones, Vita, Ceta, Vīdūsaka and Pīthamarda, the new one Priyanarmasakhā, the most friendly confidant illustrated by Subala of Gokula (pp 32-36). Of those on the side of the heroines, Rūpa mentions the Svayamdūtī and the Āptadūtī (p. 37), and among the latter, besides the usual Śilpakārī, Daivajñā, Sakhī etc, he adds the Vana-devatā or the sylvan deity as a special friend and aid in the case of Kṛṣṇa's love-sports (pp. 126-145),¹ the Sakhī, Rūpa further elaborates (p 155ff), and speaks of a threefold classification of her into one attached more to Kṛṣṇa, one attached more to Rādhā and one attached equally to both.

Following the Rasamañjarī, our Śrīngāramañjarī gives the Sakhī and Dūtī separately, for, though the Sakhī may become a Dūtī, the two are functionally distinct (p 41).

¹ See also S. K. De, 'the Bhakti-rasa-śāstra of Bengal Vaisnavism, I.H.Q. VII. p. 679.

Among Dūtīs, our text first gives eight, Dāsī (servant), Sakhī (friend), Kāru (a woman employed in some calling), Dhātreyī (nurse's daughter), Prāñveśinī (neighbour-woman), Līnginī (one in disguise), Śilpinī (artiste like a painter or one dealing in art-wares like pictures) and Svā (the heroine herself who arranges for union with her lover). The text adds that the Āmoda on the Rasamañjarī mentions some other woman-accomplices too, the recluse woman (Yoginī pravrajitā), the little girl innocent of love (ajñāta-manmatha-vikārā Bālā), the omen-reader (śakunaññāpikā Vipraśnikā), the music and dance artiste (gāna-natana-pātava-vatī Natī), in fact, the Āmoda adds two more, the Saurandhrī who helps toilette and vendors of betels etc. (Vikretrī tāmbūlakārini-prabhrīh)¹ The Śrngāramañjarī then adds two more, the Vikretrī, given already in the Āmoda, and the Śankitā, the Vikretrī refers to vendors of articles, four of whom are, according to the text, of special interest here, the vendors of glass (bangles etc.), perfumes, gems and flowers, the Śankitā is a special psychological type who hastens to the hero lest he should learn of the angry words of the heroine and get upset. The text points out further that if the recluse, omen-reader and miscellaneous vendors are in those roles in cognito they will come under Linginī. On the side of the Nāyaka, the Śrngāramañjarī gives the four aids, Pīthamarda, Vīta, Ceta and Vīdūsaka.

Of the later works noticed above under Nāyaka-Nāyikā classification, the Mandāra-maranda campū (P 86) gives a number of Sahāyas, the only minor addition here being the vendor of buttermilk (takra-vikretrī). The Rasacandrikā of the critical Viśveśvara briefly deals with the female accomplices by saying that the single type Kāru would comprehend all the possible varieties of women in different callings like the washerwoman (Kārupadam rajakyādīparam, p. 33); regarding the male accomplices, Viśveśvara has some remarks on the Pīthamarda which we shall notice shortly. The Śrngārāmrtalaharī of Sāmarāja deserves notice on this subject of Dūtīs, for it takes a critical and independent stand and says that the Dūtī-type called Svā or Svayamdūtī, referring to the heroine functioning as her own accomplice, which has been handed down from very early times, is not to be accepted, she is really a Nāyikā and not a Dūtī and it is the view of some that she is to be included in the Nāyikā-variety called Vāg-vidagdā.

स्वयंदूत्यास्तु नायिकात्वेन सहायत्वाभावाद् वाग्निदग्धायामन्तर्भावात् । P. 142

Sāmarāja accepts only three kinds of accomplices, Sakhī, Dūtī and Cetī and says that the rest Dāsī etc. are all included here.

Before we take leave of this section, there are two points to which we must devote some attention. Just as, in later times, the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikās was separated from general treatises on poetics, dramaturgy or erotics, and special tracts arose devoted exclusively to its elaborate treatment, a further step towards specialisation resulted in the production of a text solely devoted to the elaboration of the work of the accomplices in love. In Kāvya-mālā gucchaka XIII, pp 25-32 we have a text of this class called Dūtīkarma-prakāśa. The author's name is printed in the heading as well as in the body of the text twice as Pandarī Vihvala². There is an editorial footnote saying that nothing is known of the author. I may state here that the author is none else than the famous musicologist, Pundarika Vittala, author of the Sadrāgacandrodaya, Nartanānirnaya etc. It has already been known that this author signs himself in his works on music and dance as Karnāta-jātīya Pundarika Vitthala, that he hailed from the Karnāta country, that he was first in the court of Burhan Khan of the Farukhī family where he wrote his Sadrāgacandrodaya, then came under the patronage of Mādhavasīmha and Mānasīmha of Jaipur mentioned in his Rāgamañjarī, and through them got introduced to Akbar for whom he wrote the Nartanānirnaya, and that he flourished thus in the latter half of the 16th cent.

1 P. 494 Adyar Ms. The Āmoda quotes here earlier Anustubh verses from a Sāhityadarpana giving thirteen kinds of Dūtīs, but they are not from Viśvanātha's work.

2 The text as printed here shows corruptions and gaps.

A.D.¹ I have pointed out elsewhere² that, like some of the other musicologists, Pundarika Viṭṭhala was also a writer in other branches of knowledge and in the Śiṅhrabodhinī Nāmamālā preserved in a manuscript in the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, (Ms. no. G. 760, Des Cat. Vol. VI No 4709), we have a lexicon compiled by him. In this Dūtīkarmaprakāśa we have yet one more work of the same Pundarika Viṭṭhala, as can be seen clearly from the following evidence. The beginning words of the opening Mangala-śloka of the Dūtīkarmaprakāśa are identical with those in the Śiṅhrabodhinī nāmamālā गणेश भारती नत्वा । The colophon of the work runs इति कर्णाटजातीयदूतीकर्मप्रकाशः which is probably a scribal ellipsis for the fuller कर्णाटजातीयपुण्डरीकविह्वल etc found at the end of all his other works. Further, at the end of the treatment of the Dūtīs and at the beginning of the treatment of the aids of the Nāyaka, we have a verse here which informs us that the patron Burhan Khan, son of Farukī Tāja Khan, whose is mentioned in his Sadrāga-candrodaya, asked Viṭṭhala to compose this tract on the accomplices in love.

नरपतिचु(बु)रहा (खा)नः फारुकीती(ता)जसूनुः कविमतिनलिनीनां भासते बालभानुः ।

कविवर कुरु दूतीकर्मव(म)र्मप्रकाशं त्रिति गदति कृतं तत्पण्डरीविह्वलेन ॥ P. 31

In this tract, Pundarika Viṭṭhala clearly appears as using the Rasamañjarī of Bhānūdatta. On the Nāyikā-side, the following additional female aids are mentioned by him. Vicitravacanā, an eloquent and capable advocate; Gānavatī, one that could sing the praise of the lover's qualities, Prāsanginī, one that happens to go to the lover's place on private work and is availed of to carry the love message also; Skhaltā, whose definition and illustration are not very clear, but who appears to refer to two kinds, the messenger who fails to bring about the union and is scolded later for the failure, and the messenger who is saved the mission by the sudden arrival of the lover on his own behalf; (both are Skhaltās, the former's mission having failed, the latter's not having come off at all), Para-citta-viśesaññā, the psychological expert who can understand others' mind well, who is the same as the Pratipatti-vicaksanā of Bharata, Ceṣṭā-sanketa-kovidā, an adept in employing and interpreting secret signals and symbols, and Saucikī, the tailor-woman. Viṭṭhala's definition and illustration of Svayamdūtī are very weak, for these present her as the Nāyikā suggesting her feelings to the lover by a clever act or speech, which would explain how some writers, as noted above, suggested her inclusion in the Vāg-vidagdha Nāyikā. Vesadhārī is given as comprehending several guises and Manihārī as the vendor of glass-bangles. On the side of the hero, Viṭṭhala gives the four well-known accomplices, Pīṭhamarda, Vita, Ceta and Vidūsaka.

Among the accomplices noticed above, there are only three, one on the female side and two on the male side, about whom there is some difference of opinion among writers, which it is necessary to refer to in this historical and critical survey. The former is the case of the Nāyikā herself becoming a messenger, Svayamdūtī or Svā, the meanings given to this term by Vātsyāyana and the later writers, as also the view of certain writers alluded to by Sāmañja that she is really a variety of the Nāyikā and not of the Dūtī have all been touched upon already. The latter, the two male-accomplices, are the Vita and the Pīṭhamarda. It has already been pointed out that the Pīṭhamarda is not to be seen in Bharata, that he is found in Vātsyāyana who omits Bharata's Ceta, and that while some of the earlier texts give Vātsyāyana's list of male-aids,

1. See my Later Sangita Literature, Journal of the Madras Music Academy, Vol. IV. p. 58; and P. K. Gode, ibid, Vols VI-VIII pp 119-126, Chronology of the Works of Pundarika Viṭṭhala.

2. See my Non-musical Works of Some Leading Music Writers, Journal of the Madras Music Academy, Vol. XX. p. 153.

3. The colophons in the ms. of the Śiṅhrabodhinī nāmamālā also read Pandarī(ka); so does a colophon in a BORI ms. of his Sadrāgacandrodaya, 646 (a) of 1899-1902; see Des. Cat. of the BORI Mss., XII. p. 393.

Pīthamarda, Vita and Vidyāsaka, later texts combine both Vātsyāyana and Bharata and give them as four including the Ceta. The Vidyāsaka is too well-known to need any special elucidation here. As already pointed out, the Ceta is an inferior character, of a servant's status; though obviously on a par with the very common Ceti on the female-side, the Ceta as such is very rare in drama, later texts which define him simply as 'sandhāna-kuśala', adept in bringing together or in making up the differences between the lovers, do not bring out his exact identity, we get a picture of him from Sthāvaraka in the Mrcchakatika and the Ceta attending upon the Vita Śekhara in Act III of the Nāgānanda. The Vita in the Nāgānanda is far more debased in conception than the one in the Mrcchakatika. Earlier texts like the Śrngāratilaka and the Daśarūpaka define the Vita as 'eka-vidya', one endowed with knowledge in one of the arts, गीतादिविद्याना मध्ये नायकेष्वयोगिनीनामेकस्या विद्याया वेदिता विटः—Avaloka, एक राजोपयोगि किञ्चिद् गीतादिषु मध्ये वेत्तित्येकविद् विटो ज्ञेय इति—Nāṭyadarpana, p 199. This does not give an adequate idea of the Vita. Our Śrngāramajjarī is more correct when it defines him as a master of all arts and lores 'sakala-vidyā-pārangata'. The meaning of the word Vita has on one side got debased as in the Nāgānanda, and on the other, generalised into a voluptuary. Śyāmilaka's Bhāna, the Pādātādītaka¹, glorifies him into a knight of love. For the exact conception of the Vita, however, we have to go to Vātsyāyana to whose text, Bhoja of all Ālankārikas is nearer. Bhoja quotes Vātsyāyana's Sūtra itself on Vita in his Śrngāra Prakāśa (p. 481, Vol III Madras Ms.), and in his Sarasvatikanthābharaṇa (p 603) he summarises the Kāmasūtra thus

मान्यः कलत्रवान् भुक्तविभवो गुणवान् विटः ।

The Vita was once a Nāgaraka and a hero (Nāyaka) himself when he was a man of means, he has his own permanent abode and family life in the city, a man of parts and greatly experienced in love affairs, he, having lost most of his own personal resources, has now attached himself to other Nāgarakas of means

भुक्तविभवस्तु गुणवान् सकलत्रो वेशे गोष्ठ्यां च बहुमतस्तदुपजीवी च विटः ।

Vātsyāyana I 4 45. His learning, wide culture, experience and capacity and above all his noble character and integrity, all stand enlivened before us in the Vita depicted by Śūdraka. He is therefore hardly the 'ekavidya' that some texts call him.²

The Pīthamarda was far less understood in later times. Works of dramaturgy so generalised his meaning as an accessory helpful to the main character that they called him the Patākā-nāyaka, hero of the subsidiary plot or episode in the play, and illustrated him by characters like Makaranda attached to Mādhava in the Mālatī-mādhava and Sugrīva attached to Rāma in the Rāmāyana plays

पताकानायकस्त्वन्यः पीठमर्दो विचक्षणः ।

तस्यैवानुचरो भक्तः किञ्चिद्भूतश्च तद्गुणैः ॥ II 8 Daśarūpaka

यथा मालतीमाधवे मकरन्दः, रामायणे सुग्रीवः—Avaloka

So much so that Viśveśvara says that according to some writers, the Pīthamarda has nothing to do with love !

केचित्तु पीठमर्दस्यान्यत्रोपयोगो न शृङ्गारे । P 39, Rasacandrikā.

1. In the Caturbhānī, Daksina Bhāratī Series, Madras, 1922, pp. 6-7. See also Īśvara-datta's Dhūrta-vita-samvāda in the same collection.

2. Probably 'eka-vidya' in the definition of Vita in these texts is due to some confusion with the word 'ekadeśavidya' at the beginning of the Vidyāsaka-definition which immediately follows in Vātsyāyana; even 'ekadeśa-vidya' here means 'one capable of dabbling in all Vidyās', and not one proficient in one Vidyā only. (Vātsyāyana I. 4. 46 and Jayamangalā thereon).

Bhoja who reproduces Vātsyāyana in his Śrngāra Prakāśa on both the Vita and the Pithamarda (p. 481, Vol. III Madras Ms.), and remembers Vātsyāyana's Sūtra on the Vita in his Sarasvatikanthābhārana, has however the following on the Pithamarda in his S. K. Ā., which approaches more the conception in texts like the Daśarūpaka.

अमात्यादिरासनाहः पाषण्डादिर्वा पीठमर्दः । तयोरमात्येषु माल्यवान् यथा * * * पाषण्डेषु

Other writers who do not consider the Pithamarda in connection with the plot of the drama, but deal with him as forming part of the milieu of love intrigue, give yet only a vague definition of him. Thus, while at one end texts like the Bhāvaprakāśa (p. 94, line 5) and our Śrngāramañjarī (p. 51) describe him as one pacifying the lovers when they fall out, at the other end the Śrngāratilaka, with greater vagueness, calls him simply one attached to the Nāyaka and Nāyikā (I 30). When the office of the Pithamarda gets so generalised, some writers try to make a weak distinction between him and the Vita in the matter of bringing round a woman, the former employing his verbal dexterity and the latter, methods shown in the Kāmasāstra.

अन्ये तु पीठमर्दः स्वकल्पितवाग्भिः स्त्रियं समाधत्ते, विटस्तु कामशास्त्रोपायेनेत्याहुः । P 39, Rasacandrikā

Śāradātanaya thought about his name but by saying that the Pithamarda was one who attended to his work seated on a seat before the Nāyaka,² he added nothing to our knowledge of this character. Working on the etymology of the word again, the Jain Abhidhānarājendra explains him as a scrambler for a seat in a gathering. It is therefore necessary to enquire into the correct significance of Pithamarda.

There is no specific character in the extant plays going by this name to guide us, as in the case of the Vita³ Vātsyāyana depicts his distinct nature in I 4 44.

अविभवस्तु शरीरमात्रः मल्लिकाफेनकषायमात्रपरिच्छिदः पूज्यादेशादागतः कलासु विचक्षणः
तदुपदेशेन गोष्ठ्यां वेशोचिते च वृत्ते साधयेदात्मानमिति पीठमर्दः ।

The Pithamarda is distinguished from the Vita in that, unlike the latter who is a local man and has his own settled abode and family life, he is peripatetic and is an immigrant to the place from another reputed centre of learning and high life, and is devoid of a home or family of his own. He is, like the Vita, proficient in all the arts, but is a regular teacher.

1 The Śrngāra Prakāśa mentions the Pāsandin, illustrated by Bhairavānanda of the Karpūramañjarī, separately, in addition to Vita, Vidūsaka, Pithamarda etc. Also the condition 'āsanārha' here "one deserving of a seat" is contradicted expressly by the Jayamañjalā which says of him 'पीठिकाद्यासनं तु नार्हति'.

2 पीठमर्दस्य पुरतः प्रयोक्ता नायकस्य यः । P. 94, Bhāvaprakāśa.

3. In the Mālavikāgnimitra, the Vidūsaka exclaims at the Parivāṇjikā अविहा अविहा ! उपस्थिता पीठमर्दिका पण्डितकौशिकी पुरस्कृत्य देवी । Act 1 13/14. This however does not mean that there was a female variety of this character called the Pithamardikā. As Kāṭavavema says, owing to similarity of function, the humorous Vidūsaka ascribes to her that designation : अत्र विदूषकः परिहासेन परित्राजिकाया पण्डितकौशिक्या तद्धर्ममारोपयतीति मन्तव्यम् । In his Śrngāra Prakāśa, Bhoja illustrates the Pithamarda in the following obscure and possibly corrupt words :

पीठमर्दो दन्तकः शूद्रवत्सस्य कामसेनाविप्रलम्भे । P. 482, Vol. III. Mad. Ms.

A Pithamarda named Dardaraka is mentioned in Sūdraka's Bhāna, Padmaprābhṛtaka (p. 6. Caturbhānī). In the Mahābhārata, IV. 22. 33, Kīcakavadhaparvan (see Gujarathi Printing Press edn.), we have रथिनः पीठमर्दाश्च where all the commentators, Nīlakaṇṭha, Arjunamiśra, Caturbhūja and Sarvajña Nārāyaṇa quote the Medinī 'पीठमर्दोऽतिदुष्टे स्यान् नायकस्य प्रियेऽपि च' and take him generally as a favourite of the hero.

of these arts to the courtezans and one who lives by this calling. Bereft of personal resources, he carries no effects beyond his own person and three objects which are essential and characteristic of him. These three things which exhaust his portable luggage and which Vātsyāyana gives as Mallikā, Phena and Kasāya form a puzzle. The Mallikā which is the same as the Pītha that composes his name Pīthamarda and is the symbol of his profession as an art-teacher, is probably a kind of collapsible seat which he carries about hanging on his back. The other two, Phena and Kasāya are two medicinal or toilette appliances, two powders, with which, as one still having his sexual craving, he rubbed his shanks and thighs to maintain their strength and lightness.¹

1 The Jayamangalā on the Kāmasūtras explains that Mallikā is Dandāsanikā, that it supports him, and that it hangs on his back. मल्लिका दण्डासानिका, शरीरधारणात्पूर्वनागरकाचार्यैः सकेतिता । 'मल मल्ल धारणे' इति चातुषाढात् । सा तस्य पृष्ठत एवासनार्थं भ्राम्यते । Regarding the two other things carried by him, Phena and Kasāya, the Jayamangalā shows clearly that they are two medicinal or toilette materials used for rubbing the shanks or thighs with प्रवृत्तविषयेच्छत्वाच्च जङ्घाघर्षणार्थं फेनककषायाविति । Of Phenaka we get an idea earlier also in Vātsyāyana's description of the Nāgaraka's routine, Nāgaraka-vṛtta, I 4 17, where Vātsyāyana says that he should have bath daily, massage once in two days and Phenaka every third day (तृतीयः फेनकः), here again the Jayamangalā explains that Phenaka is to be applied to the shanks or thighs lest they should become rough.

तृतीयेऽहनि जघयो फेनको देयस्स्यात् । द्विदिनान्तरित इत्यर्थः । अन्यथा ऊर्ध्वं जघे कर्कशे स्याताम् ।

There are two obvious meanings that easily suggest themselves, something producing Phena or froth, an ancient counterpart of the modern soap, and Samudraphena or cuttlefish bone. H. C. Chakladar (Studies in Vātsyāyana's Kāma Sūtra, Greater India Society, Calcutta, 1929. Pp 146, 153), takes it in the former sense and R. Schmidt, (Das Kāmasūtra, Leipzig, 1900) in the latter. Phenaka, exactly as meant by Vātsyāyana, does occur in Suśruta, Cikitsāsthāna, ch 23, among preventive measures, anāgatābādha-pratisedha, where Suśruta details the daily routine of healthy habits; here (verse 54-55), in the midst of various kinds of massage, Utsādana, Udvartana and Udgharsana, the last meaning rubbing is said to include Phenaka. उद्धर्षण तु विज्ञेय कण्डूकोटानिलापहम् । ऊर्वोस्सज्जनयत्याशु फेनकः स्यैर्यलाघवे ॥ There is no doubt that this is what Vātsyāyana refers to, but the text, the commentators, editors and translators of Suśruta do not help us to get at a conclusive meaning for Phenaka. From the text itself and Dalhana's commentary, we are not able to determine if Phenaka is an act, a variety of Udgharsana or rubbing, or the material with which such a rubbing is done. An editorial footnote here in the second revised N S Press edn with Dalhana's commentary (1931) identifies Phenaka as the material Samudraphena. Quoting the same line from Suśruta, the Śabdakalpadruma says that it is an act like rubbing—गात्रमार्जनादिवत्क्रियाविशेषः । Kaviraj Kunjalal Bhisagratna says in his translation of Suśruta (Vol 2 p 487) "Phenaka is a kind of friction (Udgharsana) of the body with small wooden rollers". We have to ignore the naive gloss of Bhāskara Nṛsiṃha Śāstrin on the Kāmasūtras (in Ms, Madras D 3912) which says that Phenaka is an ornament अलङ्कारविशेषः । From all this it appears reasonable to suppose that Phenaka is Samudraphena and its powder with which the shanks or thighs were rubbed to ensure their strength and lightness, and the rubbing itself thereby came to be called Phenaka. Kasāya, occurring along with it, in the same act, is evidently another powder, powder is a well-known meaning of Kasāya, and Chakladar's 'piece of dyed cloth' and Schmidt's 'brown red cloth' do not seem to be justified. Mallikā is indeed the most essential emblem of the Pīthamarda, on the face of it, the Jayamangalā's explanation seems to suggest a collapsible or at least a peculiar kind of portable seat carried about by him. Schmidt and Chakladar take it so, as 'a peculiar seat' or 'a folding chair'. But it appears to me that it is not so easy of interpretation, it is the same 'seat' which composes his name Pītha-marda, the Jayamangalā says: स पीठमर्द उपदेशदानेऽधिकृतत्वात् मल्लिकाख्य पीठं मुद्रातीति कृत्वा । It is a pity that we do not have more helpful materials to reconstruct this very interesting and inevitable personality in the milieu of ancient Indian love.

Some Unpublished Works on the Subject

The subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā classification attained, as already noted, great popularity in later times. Wide as the foregoing survey is, it does not take into consideration the literature on this subject which is still in manuscript. The printed works on this subject reviewed above make sometimes references to views which are not traceable in the extant printed literature, and these have evidently to be looked for in works of this class which have not yet seen the light of print, or which have not even been traced in manuscripts like the Vilāsaratnākara and Nāyikābhūṣana cited in the Āmoda and the Śrngāramañjarī. The manuscript literature on this subject comprises four classes of works, comprehensive treatises on poetics and dramaturgy, exclusive treatises on Rasas and Śrngāra in particular, and separate works dealing only with the subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā classification. I therefore append to the above-given survey a list of works in manuscript which are known to deal with our subject. The list is naturally not exhaustive, and includes only such works as are described in some of the Descriptive Catalogues of manuscripts which give adequate extracts and indication of contents.

As pointed out elsewhere in this Introduction and in the footnotes to the text here, the commentaries on the Rasamañjarī, like those of Ananta Pandita and Gurujālaśāyī Pandita refer, with or without mention of source, to a large variety of views on this subject. From the citations in the commentaries on the Amarśataka, extracts from which are given in Richard Simon's edition of the Amarśataka, (Kiel, 1893) we come to know of some rare views on this subject. Thus Ravicandra quotes in his comments on Amaru 18 (p 66, Simon's edn) a work called Kavikanthahāra, and a type of Nāyaka called Vidagdha defined in it, the same commentator gives also the definition of the Nāyaka-type called Catura (P 132). Kokasambhava says on verse 14 (P 63) that there are three types of Nāyakas called Grāmya, Anyāsakta and Kautukī, and speaks of three of the more commonly known Nāyakas, Daksina, Śaṭha and Dnrsta as subvarieties of the second type Anyāsakta; similarly under verse 15 (P. 64), he gives a new threefold classification of Nāyikās to be approached by Viṭas.

Nāyaka-Nāyikās in Poems and Plays

Hitherto we have been taking note of the varieties of Nāyaka and Nāyikā as dealt with in theoretical treatises in the field of poetics, dramaturgy and erotics. We shall now make a brief reference to the works of the poets themselves, poems and dramas, where these varieties are presupposed, mentioned by name or illustrated. That these classes were known to Kālidāsa is clear. In Act III of the Vikramorvaśīya, he introduces Ūrvaśī as an Abhisārikā, mentioning her as such both in the stage-direction and the dialogue. The picture of the Yaksī painted by him in the Meghasandeha is that of a Prositabhartṛkā. Express indication of Irāvati in his Mālavikāgnimitra being the Khanditā type is also to be had, in the same play, the hero type Daksina, and the Śaṭha too, are named. The Khanditā is mentioned in Raghuvamśa V 67 and IX 38. The love-aid Vidūsaka is too common in the plays to need any special notice. Bhāsa's Svapna-vāsavadatta features Vāsavadattā as a Prositabhartṛkā, this designation being expressly mentioned there. Viśākha-datta's lost romance on the Udayana-story, the Abhisārikā-vañcitaka, as the name itself shows, features the Abhisārikā-type. A Sankīrṇa-Prakarana, by definition, features a Sāmānyā Nāyikā, and in the leading specimen of this class, the Mrcchakatika, we have not only this class of heroine, but also the love-aids called Viṭa and Ceta. In Bhavabhūti's Prakaraṇa, as already noted, it is said in so many words that phases of love as formulated in the Kāmasūtras will be illustrated. In Prahāsanas and Bhāṇas especially, authors get greater scope to present varieties of both Sāmānyā and Parakīyā classes, as well as the Vaiśika class of heroes, and categories of characters among whom we can recognise several of the accomplices, of either sex, mentioned in the texts as helpful aids in love-affairs.

The four Bhāṇas in the Cāturbhāṇī collection are rich in illustrative material relevant to the subject of our study here, Sūdraka's Padmaprābhṛtaka, besides mentioning such characters as Pithamarda, Vita, Śākyabhiksukī, Mālākāradārikā, and the friend of the type Sahapāmsukrīdita given by Vātsyāyana (p 24, Caturbhānī edn), describes a series of courtezans in different situations, whom we can identify as Prosita-bhartṛkā (Kumudvatī, p 18), Kalahāntarītā (Śonadāsī, pp 20-21), and Vāsakasajjikā (Magadhasundarī, p 22). Greater theoretical consciousness characterises Īśvaradatta's Dhūrta-vita-samvāda apart from occurrence here of Mānavatī, Pranaya-kalaha, Abhisāra etc, we have specific discussions as to whether a Sāmānyā Nāyikā has real love or not (pp 14-15, Caturbhānī edn), the relative efficacy of the various means of bringing a lady's Māna to an end (Mānāpanodanopāyas, pp 16-17), and the many points on which aspects of love differ in the case of a Veśyā from those of a Kula-vadhū. In Vararuci's Ubhayābhisārikā, the phase of love showing the Kalahāntarītā, and the help of intermediaries like the Viṣa and the Paicāraka (Ceta) (p 2) are depicted, not only a Parivrājikā, but an eunuch, Trtiyā Prakṛti, held as a Nāyikā-type by some according to Vātsyāyana (I 5 27) is also introduced (See above, p 18). Above all, making both the hero and the heroine go after each other (Abhisāra), (p 14), which gives the title to the piece (Ubhayābhisārika), this Bhāna seems to lend support to those theorists who hold two varieties of the Abhisārikā, the Nāyikā who goes to meet the lover and she who makes the lover go to herself. While presenting the same milieu of courtesan-love, the Pādātādītaka of Syāmilaka may be taken as a special glorification of the character called Vita and his role.

Of poetical works, Hāla's Gāthāsaptasatī leads both by chronology and importance. It is a storehouse of verses depicting a large variety of moods, situations and characters in love, and forms thus appropriate illustrative literature for our subject. As has been shown in the Introduction to its 1933 edition issued by the Nirnaya Sagar Press, as also in the footnotes in the Amaruśataka published by same Press, some of the verses of the Amaruśataka are directly based on verses in this Prākṛt collection, further, Hāla's Saptasatī formed the basis not only of the Hindi Satsais of Tulasīāś (died 1623) and Bihārīlāl (C. 1603-1663), but, in the field of Sanskrit itself, of the Āryāsaptasatī of Govardhana (12th cent. A D). The commentators on Hāla's collection, Sādhāranadeva and Gangādhara have classified its seven hundred verses under different subject-heads, in the classification of the former,¹ only a few subject-heads bear direct reference to the types of Nāyikās, for instance Māminī, Bhavīsyadvirahinī, Asatī, Sati and Kulavadhū and Veśyā, while a few refer mainly to the Nāyaka (e.g. Virahin), the love-messengers and their work (e.g. Sandeśa, Dūti, Sakhī-samāśvāsa) and moods and situations in love such as Gotraskhalana which may lead to the types Khanditā etc. Similar subject-heads are also to be seen in Gangādhara's vrajyā-classification.

An independent examination of these Prākṛt verses shows that while it is not probably true that all of them were written from the point of view of love and the love-contexts assigned to some categories of these verses by commentators like Gangādhara may only be arbitrary, the majority of them are love-verses, and do betray a knowledge of the classification of Nāyikās and the nomenclature pertaining thereto. A few of the type-names expressly occur in the verses, a few occur in synonymous form; and with regard to some more, it may be said the verses presuppose or foreshadow some of the distinctions that were later clearly recognised. Apt illustrations for most of the varieties which rhetoricians later ramified can be found here. Śingabhūpala mentions the Saptasatī as containing illustrative material especially for the Parakīyā-Nāyikā (R. A. S. P. 109).

An analysis of the Saptasatī shows that the theme of the Prositapatikā in all its varieties claims the greatest attention of the poets in this collection. The Nāyaka-variety called Prosita, and the situation called Pravāsa form the emphasis in some verses, the former in I. 17, II. 29, III. 22, 61, 83, IV. 76, V. 43, 65, 66, 85, VI. 21, 39, 94 and the latter in II 11 43. In most of the other verses in this class (I 29 39 66.70 98 III. 6 8 22 83 VI 15 76 V 43 53 VI. 38 40 65 65 85 VII. 16 21 39 73. 94), the picture is of the Nāyikā separated thus by Pravāsa, referred to either by the name Pathika-jāyā or by the more common name Prosita-patikā, which is adopted in Nāyikā-classification, occasionally she is referred to also as Gata-patikā (IV. 22 V 93), a name found in the Śrngāratilaka (I 82). In I 66, 39, 98 etc the verse itself mentions the name Prosita-patikā what is more interesting is that quite a large number of verses in this class depict the tender and most appealing situation of the lover about to leave and the beloved in the pang of impending separation, which later came to be formulated as a subdivision called Pravatsyat-patikā (I 46 47 II 11 43 61 VI 2 86); the verse I. 47 uses for the Nāyikā here the designation Bhavisyat-pathikā. Still more interesting it is to find in verse V 100 an exact illustration of the case in which the Nāyaka cancels his journey on seeing the Nāyikā's sorrow, a case recognised later as a subvariety called Vīgalita-prasthāna-patikā (see Śrngāramañjarī pp. 34 35) VI. 37 depicts the lover on journey returning, which is the later Avasita-pravāsa-patikā, which some included in Prositapatikā, but which our Śrngāramañjarī argues (pp 16-17) should be included in the Vāsakasajjikā The next Nāyikā-type figuring frequently in these verses is the Parakīyā-variety called Kulatā, Asatī or Jārīnī, with whom Śingabhūpāla prominently associates the Saptasatī (I 94 II 3 4 9 71 75 III 28 31 32 40 94 95 97 VI 1 18 50 65 V. 15 16 17 61 VI 24 49 VII 16 61 62 93) The verse IV 1 answers exactly to the subvariety called Pativañcanānīpuna later recognised, and its illustration in the Śrngāramañjarī (p 11 verse 58) bears very close likeness with above noted Saptasatī-verse. The situation of Māna, which gives scope to the poets to introduce the pacifying lover and the Dūtī comes next in importance in the Saptasatī, the Mānīnī figuring here is the Mānavatī coming under the Khanditā-type (I 11 87 88 II. 8 29 IV 9 IV 14 68 74 90 V 32 65, VI 21 22 VII 5). 75) Of verses portraying the several methods of removing the Māna (Māna-vinoda-upāyas), the lover falling at the feet of the beloved (pādapatana) is illustrated by II 8 IV 90 V 32 65 (Rabhasa-cumbita), Gotra-skhalana which is one of the causes of Māna is found in IV 43 V 40 52 96 Besides, Khanditā in general is delineated also in I. 32. 90 II 26 79 82 IV 74 V. 51 52 VII. 53. 57. Another Nāyikā who gets a number of verses is the Vadhū who is the Svīyā of the texts and she is mostly presented as the Navavadhū or the Navodhā Mugdhā of the texts (I 15 55 III. 40 90 92 93 VI 25 VII 44 45 46 47. 83) Viraha and Virahotkanthitā claim a few verses (I 50 II. 78. VI 33 VII 9. 58 68), Kalahāntatā is shown in I 10 66 85 II 63 81 IV 89 VI 39, its Pranaya-kalaha variety is seen in I. 27, VII 99 depicts Krtaka or feigned Kalaha Veśyā or Sāmānyā of the texts may be seen in II 56 74 V 74 Abhisārikā is described in III 49 and IV 13 I 39 portrays the Svādhīnapatikā, the former verse using the words constituting this type-name II 2 refers to Vipralabdhā, II. 98 and VII 43 to Parakīyā Kanyā II 19 on 'yauvanonmattā', II 73 on Saubhāgyagarvitā, and IV 97 on Prema-garvitā come under the Vakrokti-garvitā class (see Śrngāramañjarī, pp. 29-32) I. 86 describing Tādana or the beating of the lover by the beloved is on the type Adhīrā.

The Vajjālaggam (Bib. Ind edn) which is another collection of Prākṛt gāthās has similar and also common verses, some of its sections are on the following Māna, Pravāsa, Viraha, Satī, Asatī, Veśyā and Dūtī

The next important work which is of illustrative value for our subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā classification is the Amaruśataka It is very difficult to identify exactly the particular Nāyikā-variety in each of the century of verses ascribed to Amaruśaka. As can be seen from the table given below, the commentators themselves do not agree in their Nāyaka-Nāyikā-identifications in these verses Vemabhūpāla who is most regular among the commentators to specify Nāyaka-Nāyikās and who mentions this determination of the Nāyaka-Nāyikā-bheda as one of the objects of his commentary, expressly says in his comments on 4, Sandastādhara etc. that there is no question of the Nāyaka-Nāyikā variety here, under 5, Alasavalitai, he cites the different identifications of the Nāyikā proposed by other commentators. The differences are sometimes between a main class and a subvariety thereof, where a Nāyikā type is to be fully characterised by the application of both the general classification, with its subclasses, and the Avasthā-classification, one commentator may mention only one aspect, while another, without giving rise to any contradiction, mention another aspect. All these being excepted, we still find that sometimes commentators make mutually contradictory identifications.

An independent analysis of the Amarūṣataka shows a preponderance of the Mānavatī type in which an erring lover, the lady in slight or strong Māna, the pleading messenger, are all again and again portrayed by the poet. Next in frequency is the lady whose lover is to go or is going or is gone on travel, Pravatsyit- or Pravasa- or Prosita-patikā, verses 10, 12, 35, 61 and 185 (N S Press edn) present the Pravatsyat-patikā, 62 answers exactly to the subvariety Vigalita-pravāsa-patikā recognised later, 88 would answer similarly to the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā or Āgatapatikā formulated later. It is not as if all the verses bear an emphasis on the Nāyikā, in some the Nāyaka is the centre of attention, in some the role played by the messenger or friend.

That by the ninth century the Amaruka verses had attained great celebrity is known from Ānandavardhana's citations of them and reference to them in terms of high praise. Earlier than all the commentators, Dharmika cites as illustrations, mostly with mention of the name Amaruka, a number of these verses in his Daśarūpakāvaloka in this same context of Nāyikā varieties.

In Govardhana's Āryāsaptāśatī (Kāvya-mālā) which was composed, according to the poet himself, as a Sanskrit replica of Hāla's seven hundred verses, we come across the following expressions occurring in Nāyaka-Nāyikā-classification, Guna-garvitā, Asatī, Kulajā, Dhīrā, Praudhā, Dakṣiṇā, Abhisārikā, Mugdhā, Navodhā, Prāṭiveśika or Jāra (i.e., Upapatī), Vipralabdā, Saubhāgya-garvitā, Pathika-Jāyā etc. Dūtī, Nīrstārthadūtī, Gotraskhalita, Jyotsnābhīṣāra etc. are also to be seen.

Illustrations of these Nāyaka-Nāyikā types with suitable verses in the different anthologies have already been referred to. See above pp. 26, 27, 32, 33.

Among later minor poems, the work called Jātīmālā available in the mss. collection of the Asiatic Society, Bengal (G 8267, Des. Cat. no. 4936) illustrates in fifty-one verses the Nāyikā-varieties. I have been able to identify its author Sakalakala Maudgalī Somanātha as the musicologist who wrote the Rāgavibodha in A. D. 1601¹. In his Rāgavibodha itself, Somanātha relates some Rāgas to some heroine-types, Velāvalī-Utkanthitā, Bhūpālī-Vāsakasajjikā etc. In his Jātīmālā, Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, mixed varieties (mīśrā), and the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās are illustrated.

Nāyaka-Nāyikās in some other Indian Languages and Music

The Śrngāramañjarī, it has already been mentioned, refers to works on this subject in both Hindi and Telugu. Of the Hindi works on this subject, two are referred to in it, the Sundaraśrngāra and the Rasikapriyā, a brief account of these two works has already been given above and mention will again be made of them in another section below. Under Gāthāsaptāśatī, reference has already been made (p. 54) to the Hindi Satsai of Bihārīlal, which later formed the basis of two Sanskrit Saptāśatīs, by Hanuprasād of Benares (c. 1775) and Paramānanda (Śrngārasaptāśatī—1869)². That the Śrngāramañjarī itself is based on a Telugu original of that name and that the Nārāyaṇa Kāvya referred to in it is probably a Telugu work have also been mentioned. Mention has also been made above (p. 8) of the most outstanding contribution in Telugu on this subject, viz. the musical compositions called Padas by the celebrated Carnatic musician-composer Ksetrajñā who was patronised at the same court with which the author of our Śrngāramañjarī was connected closely. Ksetrajñā's Padas number some thousands and have not been completely published. For a long time the important part of the repertoire of the courtesans doing Bharata nāṭya and the mainstay of the Bhāva-abhinaya portion of their dance-recitals, these Padas came to be widely imitated, some of the later Pada-composers approaching almost the excellence of Ksetrajñā. In the Tamil country, where the Telugu dance and music heritage was most carefully preserved, Tamil versions and Tamil Padas also on the model of Ksetrajñā's compositions arose. Each Pada of Ksetrajñā depicts a mood of love and a distinct variety of Nāyikā, and answers exactly to definitions of Nāyikā-varieties described in theoretical treatises like the Rasamañjarī. In fact, there is a manuscript in the Madras Govt. Oriental Mss. Library called the Śrngārarasamañjarī in which the Rasamañjarī and its Nāyikā-varieties have all been illustrated each with a Pada of Ksetrajñā.³

The Tamil counterparts of the Telugu Padas of Ksetrajñā were referred to previously. More strictly adhering to the purpose of illustrating and depicting the several classes of Nāyikās and Nāyakas, a composer named Rāma Bhārati who flourished at Tiruvayyār near Tanjore in the time of King Shahaji composed Tamil songs which are preserved in a manuscript in the Sarasvatī Mahal Library, Tanjore¹ Another, Vāsudeva Kavi of the same court composed similar Nāyikā-songs in Tamil, Telugu and Sanskrit²

Independent of this tradition, classical Tamil literature had its own old scheme of classifying both the hero and heroine into different classes according to their age. Uḷ is one of the ninety-six kinds of Tamil compositions (Prabandhas), it describes a deity or hero going in procession through the street where courtezans live and the women-folk there, from the young onwards, giving expression to their love for the deity or the hero. The Ādi-ūḷ on Ceramān of the 9th cent. A.D. is the earliest composition in this class. The women are described in the Uḷs in distinct classes represented by seven stages in their growth. According to the authority Poiḥaiyār, the seven stages are as follows:

Name	Age	Number of years
Pedaḷ	5-8	4
Pedumbaḷ	9-10	2
Mangaḷ	11-14	4
Madandaḷ	15-18	4
Arivaḷ	19-24	6
Terivaḷ	25-29	5
Periḷampē	30-56	7

But according to the Vaccaṇandimāḷai and Ilakkaṇaviḷakkam, the age and duration of these classes are as follows:

5—7 (3), 8—11 (4), 12—13 (2), 14—19 (6), 20—25 (6), 26—31 (6) and 32-40 (9). See Panniruppāṭṭiyal, Saiva Siddhanta Publication Society Series, Madras and Tirunelveli, pp. 74-79. According to Prof. S. Vaiyapuri Pillai, this classification as such is not known to the Sangam works, though a general use is found therein of the expression Pedaḷ-p-paruvam, the very early age of innocence.

Men are also similarly classified; though those between the ages of 16 and 48 are specified as fit to be theme for an Uḷā, men are also generally classified from their tender age onwards into seven stages:

Bālan—1-7 years; Mūḷi—8-10, Maṇavōn—11-14, Tiraṇvōn—15th year only; Kāḷai—16th year only, Viḍalai—17-30; Mudu-mahan—beyond 30.

Nāyikās in Painting

The subject of Nāyaka-Nāyikā types attained a further dimension by the association of the art of painting. The attractive delineation of the several moods of love and the condition of lovers proved a theme of great fascination to painters. The earliest work of love poems of which we have an illustrated manuscript is the celebrated Amaruśataka, in the Mayūrbhañj State in Orissa, a palm-leaf manuscript of it in Oriya script, assignable to c 1600, has been discovered, and Dr St Kramrisch has given an account of this manuscript together with reproductions of four of the drawings in it in the *Journal of the Indian Society of Oriental Art*¹ The Rasamañjarī, a work of basic importance in this branch of study, has also been illustrated by artists of the Kangra or Pahadi (Hill) school A fine illustration of the Jyesthā-Kaniṣṭhā Nāyikās in this Rasamañjarī-series is reproduced in Rajput Painting (Faber Gallery of Oriental Art with Introduction and Notes by Basil Gray. Plate 1)² According to Sri O.C. Gangoly, this illustrated manuscript of the Rasamañjarī is dated in Samvat 1752 in the reign of Raja Kirapāla, the chief of Bhasholi in the Panjab Himalayas. The Hindi works on this subject, which we have already noted and which are mentioned in our Śrngāramañjarī itself, viz, the Rasikapriya of Keśavadāsa and the Sundaraśrngāra of Sundaradāsa have also been illustrated by the same Hill School of painters, and attention to the illustrated manuscripts of these works has been drawn by Ananda K Coomaraswami and Sri O C Gangoly³. That similar love-poems were illustrated by painters of other schools in other parts of the country can be gathered from the fact that we have a manuscript of the middle of 15th century illustrating the Vasanta vilāsa and belonging to the Western Indian School

Thanks to the courtesy of Sri O.C Gangoly, I have been able to include in this volume some paintings illustrating Nāyikā-types.

The Śrngāramañjarī, the Rasamañjarī, the Rasamañjarī-Āmoda and Estimate of the Śrngāramañjarī

As already mentioned, the Śrngāramañjarī bases itself mainly on the Rasamañjarī which soon became a standard work on the subject The Śrngāramañjarī regularly submits the Rasamañjarī to a critical examination, and on most occasions differs from it; while some of the points made by the Śrngāramañjarī against Bhānudatta are no doubt

1. See Vol VIII 1940 pp 225-240 Plate X fig. 2 'Santyevātra gihe gihe' -the Nāyikā illustrated is Svīyā Madhyā (guru) Mānavatī; fig. 4 'Aham tenāhutā'-Mugdā according to Vema but Svairinī according to Arjunavarman, fig. 3. 'Smararasanulīputena.' The last verse 'Smararasanadī' and its illustration in fig. 3 are not properly understood by Kramrisch The three figures in between the two lovers are the Guru, the elders, in the expression 'gurusetubhih', they are not, as she says, three women representing a repeated requisite in the illumination of the manuscript, who do not occur in the verse but only in the illustration, and who are Sakhīs discussing the nature of this strong (guru) dam (setu).

2 This publication reproduces also a Nāyika-picture (plate 10) from the Lady Rothenstein collection (Kangra School, early 19th cent), identified as of the Vāsakasajjika but more correctly Virahotkanthitā It is also mentioned here that the Lalbhai collection in Ahmedabad has a large number of Nāyikā-Paintings significant, there are a few which are not so ; however, that this criticism is not prompted by any animus against Bhānudatta, such as, for instance, exhibited by Jagannātha Pandita against Appayya Dikṣita, is amply borne out not only by the language of the criticism but also by certain contexts in which the Rasamañjarī is expressly accepted and followed and certain others where the treatment in the Śrngāramañjarī is indebted to that in the Rasamañjarī, there are even illustrative verses in our text which are adaptations of those found in Bhānudatta's work

Almost as regularly as the Rasamañjarī is criticised, the commentary on it called Āmoda is followed. As already pointed out, while the author of the basic text, Bhānudatta, is invariably referred to in singular number, his Commentator, the Āmoda-author, Gurajālaśāyī Pandita, is always cited in our text with the reverential plural, and in one place, the Āmodakāra is mentioned as a gifted writer, Praudhā Āmodakārāḥ, p 11, line 25. As the Āmoda on the Rasamañjarī is an unprinted work, I have extracted in the footnotes to the text here the relevant portions of the Āmoda from its manuscript, wherever the Śrngāramañjarī mentions or presupposes it, and the extent of the indebtedness of the Śrngāramañjarī to the Āmoda is much more than is evident from these footnotes. But here again it should not be supposed that the author of the Śrngāramañjarī slavishly follows the Āmoda. On the other hand, always open in mind and critical in outlook, our author does not refrain from criticising and rejecting some of the views of the Āmoda.

In the detailed summary of contents that follows, and in the table of Nāyakas and Nāyikās accepted by the Śrngāramañjarī appended to it, the views of the Śrngāramañjarī can be seen in full; also, in the foregoing historical survey, some of the views of our author, in their relation to the views of other writers, earlier and later, have been touched upon. In this section, I shall review particularly the contexts in which the Rasamañjarī and the Āmoda figure in the discussions in the Śrngāramañjarī. First I shall deal with the definitions of the different Nāyikās, and then with the classifications.

(ii) Definitions

Svīyā (p 3). The Rasamañjarī and most other works of this class define the Svīyā as one who loves one's legally wedded lord only स्वामिनि एव अनुरक्ता स्वीया । The Śrngāramañjarī argues that the word 'eva', 'only', in the definition is needless. It is not only superfluous but also wrong in as much as it prevents a Svīyā becoming a Parakīyā. As explained in the Āmoda and other commentaries, the need for 'eva' is to ward off overlapping, Ativyāpti, with Parakīyā who has, according to these writers, love to the paramour as well as to her wedded lord. The Śrngāramañjarī does not accept this position, as, according to it, love is love and it can, really speaking, be towards only one, the wedded lord or the paramour. The Āmoda's further explanation (p. 34, Adyar Ms) that love is possible towards both the husband and the paramour and that, to keep the former off the scent, the unchaste wife may still indulge in enjoying the former's company too, is not acceptable to the Śrngāramañjarī. It contends that love is not mere sexual enjoyment and that Anurāga or love so called being applicable only to one, there need be no adjunct like 'eva' to distinguish the Svīyā from the Parakīyā.

Of the two criticisms thus offered by the author of the Śrngāramañjarī, the former that if 'eva' is added, no Svīyā could become Parakīyā is irrelevant; we are dealing here only with the Svīyā and she is so only as long as she is attached solely to her lord; when she is also attached to a paramour, she ceases to be Svīyā.¹ This classification into Svīyā,

1 See Rasamañjarī न च परिणीताया परगामिन्यामतिव्याप्तिः । अत्र पतिव्रताया एव लक्ष्यत्वात् (p. 12) and Āmoda thereon (p 37) यावत्कालं पतिव्रता तावत्कालं स्वीयैव * * * परपुरुषगमनप्रारम्भे तु परकीयात्वेन तस्या न लक्ष्यतेति भावः ।

Parakīyā and Sāmānyā is, comparatively speaking, fundamental, and not contingent on changing situation, avasthā, like that into Svādhīnapatikā etc. The other criticism rests completely on the over-refinement of the meaning of Anurāga or love.

Mugdhā (pp 3-4) The first sub-class under Svīyā, Mugdhā is usually defined by writers including Bhānudatta as one in whom love has just sprouted (ankurita-yauvanā). The Śrngāramañjarī criticises this as being too wide and as applying also to Parakīyā and Sāmānyā. But as Ananta Bhaṭṭa points out, the definition of Mugdhā has to be taken along with the Svīyā-definition and not independently.

एवं च पतिमात्रानुरागवत्त्वे सति प्रत्यग्रयौवनत्वमिति फलितं मुग्धालक्षणम् । R M Vyā.

This obvious qualification of the definition removes its apprehended applicability to Parakīyā and Sāmānyā.

A further objection to this definition is that it is based on age and is out of place in this study which is based on guna or quality. The question of age can never be dissociated from the threefold classification Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā; a little below, the text itself speaks of princesses of grown-up age, atipraudha-vayaskāh rājakanyāh. Further the condition of 'sprouting youth or love' is not necessarily one of mere age; it can well be taken as one of guna or quality.

Another equally well known definition of Mugdhā, given in the Pratāparudrīya, is that she is one in whom bashfulness gets the upper hand over love (lajjā-vijita-mannīthā). The Āmoda says that this definition means the same as the previous one. The Śrngāramañjarī objects to this also. The first variety of Mugdhā is ajñāta-yauvanā and to her this will not apply, for in this stage, there is neither love nor bashfulness nor any question of the latter overpowering the former¹.

Therefore the new definition of Mugdhā proposed by the Śrngāramañjarī is that she is one who does not yet have the finer appreciation of man, puruṣa-viśesa-anabhijñā. This innocence of the finer appreciation, which is very vague, can only mean innocence in love-matters in general. The negative character of the definition is also fraught with the danger of taking away the Mugdhā totally out of the scope of Nāyikā-study; and in its significance on the positive side it comes to the same thing as 'one in nascent youth'.

The Navodhā-definition (p. 4) in the Śrngāramañjarī is the same as that in the Rasamañjarī.

Ati-visrabdha-navodhā (p 4) In the Rasamañjarī, immediately after the definition of Madhyā, we find a sentence that this Madhyā, owing to her experience being of a further developed nature is also called Ati-visrabdha-navodhā. This sentence is, according to Ananta Bhaṭṭa, not found in all manuscripts of the Rasamañjarī, and is an interpolation, there being also no illustrative verse for it.

एषैव चातिप्रश्रयादतिविस्मयनबोदेति काचित्कः पाठस्तु अतीव धार्ष्ट्याभाववत्यां तस्यां धार्ष्ट्य-प्रयुक्तमध्यान्यवहारासंभवाद् अनुदाहृतत्वाच्च अनुपादेयः । P. 31

Apart from absence in some mss. and lack of illustrative verse, the conception itself, Ananta Bhaṭṭa says, is inherently wrong, as such a degree of confidence or boldness does not belong to the Madhyā stage. But according to the Āmoda, this sentence forms part of the text; according to it, a separate illustrative verse is not necessary for this, as it is only another name for Madhyā.

1. Some do not give such a meaning to Ajñāta-yauvanā; according to them she knows that youth has sprung up in her, but others are not able to know that. Ananta Bhaṭṭa says in his Rasamañjarī-vyākhyā वयं तु, न ज्ञातं यौवनं यस्याः, ज्ञातं यौवनं यया इत्येवार्थ इति ब्रूमः । p. 27.

एतेन अतिविस्मयनबोदाया अनुदाहृतत्वाद् एवैवेत्यद्यतनपाठ इति केषांचिदूषणमलम्बकं वेदितव्यम् । P. 84.

Viśveśvara, as already pointed out (p. 29 above), accepts this alternate name for Madhyā. The Śrngāramañjarī however (p. 4), adopting the line of argument seen in Ananta Bhaṭṭa's commentary, criticises and discards this Ativīśrābdha-navoḍhā; it argues that ativīśrābdha pertains only to Pragalbhā, and Navoḍhā is always a Mugdhā and the conception of an Ativīśrābdha-navoḍhā is self-contradictory.

Pragalbhā (p. 5) While considering the Rasamañjarī-definition of Svīyā, our text, we noted above, pointed out that the adjunct 'eva' in 'svāmīnyeva' was unnecessary. A similar objection is raised here against the Rasamañjarī-definition of the Pragalbhā, that she is one whose proficiency in love is with reference solely to her wedded husband (pati-mātra, etc.). The reason why the Śrngāramañjarī objects to the restrictive 'mātra' here is that such a definition would be too narrow, and apply only to the Svīyā-pragalbhā and not to the Parakīyā and the Sāmānyā. Earlier while examining a definition of Mugdhā, the Śrngāramañjarī pointed out that there was no Mugdhā in Parakīyā and Sāmānyā. Here it adds that of these three stages, Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, the first two are only in the Svīyā and the last would apply also to the Parakīyā and Sāmānyā. The Śrngāramañjarī, which follows the Āmoda here, adopts the definition of Pragalbhā given in that commentary, namely, one whose love has overcome bashfulness.

मदनविजितलज्जाकृत्वं संपूर्णयौवनत्व वा तल्लक्षणम्; न च वेद्यादावतिव्याप्तिः, इष्टत्वाद्देव्यादेः स्वीयाया इव मौग्ध्याद्यभावेऽपि प्रागल्भ्यस्यावश्यमङ्गीकरणीयत्वात् । Pp. 90—91. And earlier also on p. 55 वस्तुतस्तु प्रागल्भ्यात्त्वमात्रं संभवति; पतिमात्रविषयेत्यादि वक्ष्यमाणतल्लक्षणे पतिमात्रविषयेति विशेषणस्य परिभाषामात्रतापत्त्या व्यर्थत्वादिति वक्ष्यते ।

Dhīrā etc (p. 6) : In the view of earlier writers, the distinction into Dhīrā, Adhīrā and Dhīrādhīrā applies only to Svīyā, and not to Parakīyā and Sāmānyā. Bhānudatta differs from them and accepts these classes for the Parakīyā also. It is noteworthy that, on this point, while the Āmoda disagrees with the Rasamañjarī (see fn. p. 6 of the text), the Śrngāramañjarī which generally disagrees with the Rasamañjarī and follows the Āmoda, follows the former and disagrees with the latter. It may be added here that Ananta Pandita holds, in his gloss on the Rasamañjarī, that Māna and consequent varieties Dhīrā etc., are possible in the Mugdhā-variety called Jñāta-yauvanā, and that the failure to mention these varieties under Mugdhā constitutes a gap in the Rasamañjarī.

वस्तुतस्तु ज्ञातयौवनारूपमुग्धाभेदस्यैते भेदा भवितुमर्हन्तीति तदनाभिधानान्यूनैव । P. 44.

This too, the Āmoda discountenances.

मुग्धाया अपि मानोऽस्तीति प्रतीतेर्वैद्यादिभेदाः संभवन्तीति केनचिदुक्तं, तदयुक्तम् । etc. P. 1131.

That the later writers hold these varieties for all, as against the earlier authors, who confine them to the Svīyā, is recorded by Viśveśvara and Triṣaṭṭhi Śivarāma; Sāmarāja follows the ancients (see above Intro pp. 28-29).

Madhyā Adhīrā (p. 6) · Bhānudatta defines this variety as using harsh words to show her anger against her lord (Rasamañjarī p. 42); the Śrngāramañjarī considers harsh words impossible in one of such tenderness as the Madhyā and therefore defines

1. Here, as also elsewhere, certain criticisms found in the Āmoda seem to refer to Ananta Pandita's gloss on the Rasamañjarī. If these anonymous allusions in the Āmoda are really to Ananta Pandita we may take this as additional evidence for Gurujālaśāyin's date (see above Intro. p. 14), Ananta Pandita wrote his gloss on the Rasamañjarī in 1636 A.D. (India Office Ms 1224-5) and Gurujālaśāyin should have followed with his gloss soon after this.

the Madhyā Adhīrā as one adopting the veiled censure of an anyāpadeśa to show her anger (p 7)

Parakīyā (pp 7-8) : Bhānudatta defines the Parakīyā as one who is in secret love with a person other than her wedded husband (aprakata-para purusa-anurāgā). The Śrngāramañjarī criticises that the adjunct introducing 'secrecy' is needless. There are varieties of Parakīyā whose love-affair is known to their close friends and others (Lakṣitā and Kulatā), it is not possible to explain 'secrecy' as referring only to the ignorance of the affair to the wedded husband, for there are cases of unchaste women to whom husbands are attached, knowing their wives' infidelity. The Āmodakāra 'replies' the adjunct 'secret' and says that in any case an original element of secrecy at the beginning was always and unavoidably present. The Śrngāramañjarī's answer to this is that in the case of a Śravanānuraktā, one who has developed love for a paramour on a friend's report about his beauty etc., even this trace of original secrecy is impossible in as much as the friend is a witness. Therefore, the Śrngāramañjarī defines Parakīyā simply as one attached to a lover other than her husband. As there is no distinction of husband and another for a courtesan, the obvious purpose suggested for the adjunct 'aprakata', viz. that it is to ward off overlapping with the courtesan whose love is open, is to be dispensed with. Tripāthi Śivarāma, like our author, rejects the word 'aprakata' introduced by the Rasamañjarī.

अथ संज्ञायाः परस्वयेयं परकीयेत्यत्रोपयोग इति 'अप्रकट' इत्याद्यनुपयुक्तम् ।

Rasaratnahāra, K. M. Gucc. VI, p. 123.

Just as the Āmoda justified 'aprakata-' by explaining it as 'an element of secrecy at sometime', some others seem to have justified the adjunct by adopting the reading 'aprakṛtita'. This is known from Ananta Pandita's gloss (p 64- यत्तु अप्रकटितेति पाठः etc.).¹ According to these commentators, it does not matter if the love affair of this lady is known, but so far as she herself is concerned, she does not show it and strives to hide it. Ananta Pandita's own view is that the Parakīyā is one who is in love with another man not purely for pecuniary considerations.

मम तु वित्तमात्रानुपाधिकपरपुरुषानुरागवत्त्वं परकीयात्वमिति युक्तमाभाति । P. 64

But the Srngāramañjarī would not agree to this kind of distinction of the Parakīyā from the Sāmānyā and to its author, there is, in the first place, no question of Para or Sviya for the Sāmānyā, and then, the Sāmānyā is not to be defined solely on the basis of 'money'

Sāmānyā (pp. 12-13) : In the Rasamañjarī-definition of this Nāyikā, the Srngāramañjarī criticises both the conditions said to characterise her love, first, being governed solely by money, vitta-mātra-upādhika, and second, the love having for its object every-body, sakala-purusa-anurāga. Bhānudatta lays some emphasis on 'the sole consideration of money' and argues that even in cases of real love, material consideration has played the chief role at least at the beginning. The Srngāramañjarī contends that love as such cannot be caused by money, nor can it be for many; on such a definition therefore there can be neither love nor a Nāyikā. It is not possible to dilute the meaning of love to refer to such relationship as a courtesan exhibits for money towards a person; love is a specific feeling between a lover and a beloved and not any kind of relation. If some kind of vague desire for many should be meant, there will hardly be any Sviyās left. The Āmoda tries to explain that the love of a Sāmānyā is not the semblance of sentiment, Rasābhāsa, by reason of the many persons towards whom it is directed, because at the time she is engaged to one, she is attached to that person only, and so far as that particular engagement is concerned it is real love. This explanation too is not acceptable to the author of the Śrngāramañjarī. To him, even the Kulatā, the Parakīyā who resorts to many paramours, is really searching for a best lover for herself, therefore, the Sāmānyā too has real love and that towards a particular person of her choice, but she merely consorts with several persons for profession. On the subject of Veśyā and real love, I have also added a note in the end.

1. In the Benares Skt. Ser edn., the passage is not free from mistake; in the Gopal Narayan Co edn. (Bombay), it is much more defective, some more words having been left out. It is well-known that the printed editions do not contain the verses mentioning the place in which Ananta wrote this gloss, which are found in the India Office ms. A better edition of the Rasamañjarī with new commentaries is desirable.

According to the Āmoda, there may be Parakīyās too who accept pecuniary considerations and it is to ward off such cases that the word 'mātra', 'solely', is added to 'vitta' in the Sāmānyā-definition. This again is not acceptable to the author of the Śrngāramañjarī who considers the Parakīyā as being prompted solely by love¹. Any material gain that comes is not to be taken as essential, for otherwise even a wedded wife's Svīyā-status would be jeopardised on this ground. Therefore, the definition offered by the Śrngāramañjarī is that the Sāmānyā is one who, in the absence of marriage, consorts with many in expectation of a return phala-nimittaka. The phala or purpose is actual love in case the Sāmānyā is really attached, in other cases the purpose is money and what she exhibits is a mere general desire which is not love. Sāmarāja proposes that the Sāmānyā be defined simply by two conditions, love for many and such love in public, by the former, the Svīyā is distinguished, by the latter the Parakīyā. That such a definition was proposed by another earlier writer too, we learn from the Āmoda which cites and refutes it (p. 229).

Anyasambhogadukkhitā, Vakroktigarvitā and Mānavatī After dealing with the three main types together with their sub-classes, Bhānudatta gives a special classification applicable to all these three, according to which they fall into the three classes, the names of which are given above. The constitution of these three into a separate class like this is an innovation of Bhānudatta. Viśveśvara, as already pointed out, says that authoritative writers do not have this special threefold classification (p. 24, Rasacandrīkā). The Śrngāramañjarī rejects this separate group; it brings Anyasambhoga-dukkhitā and Mānavatī, both based on the anger of the offended beloved, under Khanditā; the remaining variety Vakrokti-garvitā is added to the next group of classification. It is, however, somewhat incongruous to club the Vakrokti-garvitā with the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās.

This next group gives an eightfold classification which all writers from Bharata downwards have mentioned. To the time-honoured eight in this group, the Śrngāramañjarī adds the Vakrokti-garvitā and thus, alone among writers on this subject, gives this group as comprising nine varieties. In the definition of these also, the Śrngāramañjarī expresses its differences with the Rasamañjarī.

Svādhīnapatīkā (p. 15) The Rasamañjarī defines this type as one having a lover who is always obedient. The Āmoda rightly explains that the word 'always' it to avoid overlapping with the other varieties in all of which the lover may be occasionally obedient or favourable. The Śrngāramañjarī, however, does not see the reason why the condition 'always' should be added, 'one endowed with a favourable lover' is sufficient according to it; its argument is that this is a contingent classification governed by states and moods which change, and no adjunct should be introduced which would make any class absolute. This again is an argument similar to the one used by the Śrngāramañjarī against the word 'eva' in the Svīyā-definition. There is no need to provide for such contingency in the definition, as one is a Svādhīnapatikā only so long as the consistency of the obedient lover continues; the moment he develops disappointing behaviour, the state of Svādhīnapatikā ceases and some other type results.

1. Compare Śrngāratilaka I. 61—पराङ्मना । अस्यास्तु केवल प्रेम तेनैषा रागिणा मता ॥

Another important point raised by the Śrngāramañjarī in connection with the Svādhīnapatikā is that the earlier authors were wrong in extending the classification Dhīrā etc. to the Svādhīnapatikā also. No writer appears to have done this specifically, but this is seen and presupposed in the scheme of working up the total number of Nāyikā-varieties by putting together all the principles of classification. The Śrngāramañjarī is correct in its objection; the idea of anger and favourable disposition being mutually incompatible, Dhīrā-Svādhīnapatikā etc. is a contradiction in terms. Any feeling of temper that the Svādhīnapatikā may exhibit is only feigned, to play a joke on her friend or lover and to add a little variety to the smooth course of her love, and however much a case of love may be firm on both sides, the nature of this sentiment is such that a feeling of some miscarriage or possible untoward turn will unavoidably come. Therefore, with a good deal of understanding of the subtle nature of love, the author of the Śrngāramañjarī adds in the sub-varieties of the Svādhīnapatikā two new classes of his own, Dūṭivāñṇikā—one who hides her confirmed love and for the sake of making fun of the friend or messenger, feigns anger with her lover, and the Bhāviśāñṇitā—one who, though united with her lover yet entertains fears of a likely estrangement.

Vāsakasajjikā (pp. 16-17) On this heroine-variety, the Śrngāramañjarī quotes the definition given in the Pratāparudriya of Vidyānātha. The point to which the Śrngāramañjarī devotes a discussion under this heading is the question of a Nāyikā-type called Avasita-pravāsa-patikā, one whose husband's travel abroad is at an end, and who is making herself ready to receive him. This point is dealt with to some extent in a special note at the end on the term Vāsaka and its meaning. It is said that some bring the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā under Prosita-patikā, as the two belong to the same unit of theme-situation called Pravāsa. The Āmoda is quoted as saying that as the mood of the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā is one of joyous reception accorded to the lover, she can be brought under the Svādhīna-patikā. The exact position of the Āmoda in this respect has been set forth at some length in the footnote in the text itself at this place (p. 17). The Śrngāramañjarī holds that the joy of the Svādhīna-patikā and the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā are different feelings and are caused by different causes, the former by the constancy and obedience of the lover, and the latter by the return of a lover from travel. The inclusion under Prosita-patikā herself, the Śrngāramañjarī explains, is impossible as the Prosita-patikā is a lady in separation, suffering, longing and waiting, and this is a situation of joy. As noted already (above p. 23), the Avaloka also holds the same view: आगच्छदागतयोस्तु प्रवासामावात् p. 133. Therefore, though, to begin with, the Śrngāramañjarī does not raise any objection to the Pratāparudriya-definition, it now proposes a simpler definition the purpose of which is to comprehend the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā. According to this definition, the Vāsakasajjikā is one who is making joyous preparations, expecting her lord. The work Vilāsaratnākara which the Āmoda quotes does not accept this Avasita-pravāsa-patikā (see p. 17 text, fn.).

Virahotkanthitā (pp. 19-20) On the face of it, the simple name Virahotkanthitā would mean a lady yearning owing to separation from her lover. The Sāhityaratnākara gives such a simple definition but such an yearning is common to both the Prosita-bhartṛkā and the Vipralabdhā. According to the Pratāparudriya-definition, the lover here unduly delays his arrival and intensifies her longing. The Nāṭyaśāstra-definition includes a statement of the cause of the delay viz, pre-occupation with multifarious work. All these the Śrngāramañjarī points out, are definitions equally applicable to the Prosita-bhartṛkā and Vipralabdhā. As I have shown in the footnote on p. 19 of the text, the whole series of citations and discussions here is taken from the Āmoda which critically examines the Rasamañjarī-definition and offers its own fresh definition.

The Rasamañjarī, following a well-known authority like Rudrabhaṭṭa (Śṛī tilaka I. 75), associates her with a trysting place, Sanketa-sthala, and there she is held as anxiously thinking over the reason for the delay in her lover's arrival. The Āmoda and following it the Śṛṅgāramañjarī point out that, while on one side this definition is wide and overlaps with Vipralabdhā, on the other, it is too narrow and does not hold good for the beloved who is in Pūrvānūrāga-vipralambha i.e., in love before marriage when she is longing for meeting her lover, and for the beloved who is at home and whose husband's company is being delayed owing to manifold domestic work. A sort of negative definition is therefore offered by the Āmoda viz. that the Virahotkanṭhitā is one whose longing at the absence of union with her lover is not due to either his travel or deceitful behaviour. Because of its negative nature, this definition does not commend itself to the author of the Śṛṅgāramañjarī who refines the definition by specifying the place where the beloved is as her house itself and the absence of union as due to other work holding him. Viśveśvara steers clear of the difficulty in a much simpler manner by interpreting the 'Viraha' in Viraha-utkanṭhitā as happening in the same place. विरहश्च समानदेशस्थत्वे सति संभोगामावः । P. 19, Rasacandrikā. The Vipralabdhā and the Prosita-bhartṛkā are also warded off by the statement of utkanthā or longing as the characteristic mood of this type. The Daśa-rūpaka (II 25) also feels the old definition of the Utkanṭhitā unsatisfactory and specifies the nature and cause of the delay in the lover's coming as due to no unpleasantness in their relationship; which as the Avaloka explains earlier, while showing the distinctness and mutual exclusiveness of these eight heroine types, removes overlapping with the Khanditā too.

Vipralabdhā (pp. 21-22) : From Bharata downwards all writers, earlier or later, associate the Vipralabdhā with Sanketa, tryst; it is a lady that goes to a trysting place on a message received from her lover but finds there that he has disappointed her, who is called Vipralabdhā. See Bharata XXII 204 (K. M. edn.), Rudrabhaṭṭa I. 78, Viśvanātha III. 83 (S. D.) Vidyānātha I. 47 (Pra. ru.), Tripāṭhi Śivarāma p. 126 and Sāmarāja p. 155 (1938 reprint). Dhanañjaya, II 26, no doubt gives a definition omitting the word 'saṅketa', but from Dhanika's illustration it is clear that the disappointment of the Nāyikā happens at the place of tryst. In keeping with this general trend, Bhānudatta also defines the Vipralabdhā as the beloved who comes to the tryst and finds that the lover has disappointed her. The author of the Śṛṅgāramañjarī criticises Bhānudatta's definition that it is not applicable to a Sviyā or a Sāmānyā who do not go to a trysting place, but are expecting union or meeting at their own residence and are disappointed by the lover's failure to present himself; thus the Śṛṅgāramañjarī really enlarges the scope of the Vipralabdhā and offers its definition that she is one in the pang of separation consequent on disappointment caused by the lover.

There is yet another point with regard to the Vipralabdhā which the Rasamañjarī-definition unwittingly omits. As the Āmoda points out, the definition as it stands may overlap with the Virahotkanṭhitā whom also the Rasamañjarī associates with saṅketa. What is unique in the conception of the Vipralabdhā is what her name signifies, vipralambha, i.e., Vañcanā; the lover must have deceived her एतल्लक्षणे वञ्चितत्वे सतीति विशेषेण देयम्—Āmoda p. 328. Though the author of the Śṛṅgāramañjarī notes that this deceit or Vañcanā is the essential part of the Vipralabdhā, he does not note its omission by Bhānudatta in his criticism of the latter's definition.

To the element of Vañcanā, the Śṛṅgāramañjarī devotes some special attention. On this point, it cites the Vipralabdhā-definition from the Pratāparudriya, where Vidyānātha specifies the deceit as practised by the lover, dayitenātha vañcitā. That it is the lover who, on some ground, disappoints her is understood in the definitions of all writers, Bharata, Rudrabhaṭṭa etc. It is the author of the Śṛṅgāramañjarī alone, who, here again, enlarges the scope of Vañcanā; according to him there may be the case in which, for sheer fun and variety of interest, the friend and maid may play a joke on the heroine, hide the lover who has come in a corner of the house, tell her about his having disappointed her, and in the end call off the bluff. This, however, is a minor point on which the definition of the Vipralabdhā need not be criticised. That some other writer too who was earlier than the author of the Śrīngāramañjarī took this view of Vañcanā and considered the possibility of its being caused by the Sakhī is seen from the Āmoda which cites such a view and criticises it as impossible and going against the very conception of the Sakhī.

सा च वञ्चना प्रियस्यैव * * * न तु दूषादेः । न हि परतन्त्रा दूरी समानसुखदुःखा संकेतनिकेतस्थले अविद्यमानमपि कान्तं विद्यमानमावेद्य तत्र नीत्वा महान्तं विषादं जनयितुं शक्नोति * * अन्यथा सखीमात्रस्य अविश्वसनीयता स्यात् । अत एवोक्तं विद्यानाथेन etc. pp. 328—9

The Sakhī-vañcanā envisaged by the Āmoda is no doubt somewhat grave and may be against the very nature of a Sakhī, for according to it, the friend goes to the extent of taking the lady to the tryst on a false message, on the other hand, the Sakhī-vañcanā contemplated in the Śrīngāramañjarī is mild and quite compatible with the role of the Sakhī, for it is confined to the Sakhī merely hiding the lover who has already arrived and creating a false disappointment for a while.

Khaṇḍitā (pp 23-24). In the old conception, as seen in Bharata and Rudrabhaṭṭa, the Khaṇḍitā and Vipralabdhā go together as two kinds of disappointed Nāyikās, the former at her own place expecting her lover on the occasion (Vāsaka), when he was due and getting disappointed, and the latter at a trysting place (Sanketa) expecting the lover according to his message and getting disappointed. The conception of the Khaṇḍitā changed and when we come to the Daśarūpaka we have clear mention of the lover's misbehaviour with another lady and the jealousy of the offended lady (II. 25). It is this conception of the Khaṇḍitā that has persisted. The Āmoda cites the old Śrīngāratilaka-definition and rejects it. The Rasamañjarī-definition with which the Śrīngāramañjarī starts its discussion says that the Khaṇḍitā is one to whom the lover comes with signs of having enjoyed another lady's company. This is criticised by the Śrīngāramañjarī as being too narrow, as it does not embrace the cases where the jealousy and consequent unhappiness of a Nāyikā is caused by merely hearing of the lover's guilt or by the continued attachment of the Nāyaka to another lady, ignoring and neglecting her. That is, according to the Śrīngāramañjarī, it is not necessary for the erring lover to come and sport the symbols of his guilt before her.

The Daśarūpaka-definition which simply refers to her knowledge of the lover's new interest and her consequent jealousy would thus be acceptable to the Śrīngāramañjarī. Here again, the Śrīngāramañjarī says that definitions of these heroine types should take full note of the significance of the actual name of the type. नामानुकूला कल्पना कार्या । p 23.1 Khaṇḍitā simply means, one whose love has been cut or shattered to pieces. Therefore she is a heroine who, being offended in the course of her love, is angry, or, to put it otherwise, she is one who is jealous, her jealousy being due to her lover's misbehaviour.

It was noticed above that a special group of three types, Anyasambhogaduhkhitā, Mānavatī and Vakrokti-garvitā created by the Rasamañjarī was rejected by our work, and that the first two varieties in this group were brought by our work under the Khaṇḍitā. All varieties based on anger come under the Khaṇḍitā. It is this anger that produces the Mānavatī; the Khaṇḍitā evolves into the Mānavatī and if she gives expression to her feeling in hitting words etc., she belongs to the class Dhīrā etc.; when the same Khaṇḍitā bewails her lot before her friends, we call her Anyasambhoga-duhkhitā.

Viśveśvara does not accept even this slight difference between Khaṇḍitā and Mānavatī. The Śrīngāramañjarī says:

1. See also the discussion under Vipralabdhā, p. 23.

कोपोत्पत्तिसवमये खण्डिता; सैव मानं कुर्वती चेन्मानवती । p 23

Viśveśvara denies such a distinction and says that Mānavatī is not different from Khaṇḍitā.

अत्र हेतुदर्शनकाले खण्डिता, तज्जन्यसंभोगानुमितिकाले मानवतीत्याहुः । तन्न । तत्रापि संभोगानुमित्यैव ईर्ष्यापित्तैः । तस्मान्मानवती न भेदान्तरम् । P 24. Rasacandrikā.

Tripāthi Śivarāma too identifies Kopa and Māna and criticises the Rasamañjarī's distinction of the two. (pp 124-5).

That the correct conception of Māna is vital to the discussion is realised by the author of the Śrngāramañjarī Unlike Viśveśvara, he wants to maintain a distinct Mānavatī, but at the same time, he does not propose to give her an independent status as in the Rasamañjarī-scheme. As one interested in keeping her as an independent Nāyikā, Bhānudatta defines Māna distinctly as behaviour expressive of resentment at the lover's guilt, Priya-aparādha-sūcikā cestā This is helpful to our author, as he is also interested in keeping Mānavatī somewhat distinct from (i.e. as a sub-variety of) Khanditā; so, our author agrees here with Bhānudatta, and quoting Bhānudatta's definition of Māna with approval, says that Māna is not anger, but reticence (Mauna) caused by anger.

The jealousy roused in the Nāyikā may be due to the four causes described by Bharata, Vaimanasya, Vyalika, Vipriya and Manyu (see p. 23 of the text here) Vipriya is displeasure caused by his professing intense love and behaving in an opposite manner; Vaimanasya is the mental anguish caused by actually seeing him come from another lady's company with signs of his guilt; Vyalika is a further stage, when despite prevention he persists in frequenting the other lady, Manyu is intense resentment when the audacious rogue comes to her with his guilt evident on his person and brags before the lady about women being mad after him. All these come under the scope of Khanditā.

Anya-sambhoga-duḥkhitā (pp. 27-28): This Nāyikā who is an independent type to Bhānudatta is taken by our author as a Khanditā sub-class. Our author says that older writers considered only the Dūtī-sambhoga-duḥkhitā as the Anya-sambhoga-duḥkhitā. The older writers meant here refer only to Bhānudatta, as he was the first to constitute this and two others, Mānavatī and Vakrokti-garvitā, into a special group. As Bhānudatta does not define her but only illustrates, the Śrngāramañjarī's observation is deduced only from the illustration in the Rasamañjarī Here again the Śrngāramañjarī goes by the name of the heroine and enlarges the scope of its significance, anyā or another lady the intimacy with whom upsets the Nāyikā, may be the female-messenger herself, as in the well-known Amaruka-verse Niśśesacyutacandanam etc or any other lady Such enlargement of scope may make the Anya-sambhoga-duḥkhitā co-extensive with Khanditā, but the Śrngāramañjarī posits that an essential feature which fixes the distinctness of this as one of the varieties of the Khanditā consists in the fact that she exhibits her resentment not to her erring lover, but, in his absence, to her own friends and messengers,—Nāyaka-parokṣam duḥkhitā (p. 27) However logical such an extension is, it should be mentioned that it is in the Dūtī-sambhoga-duḥkhitā that the prominent beauty of this class comes off

Kalahāntarītā (p 28): Strangely the Śrngāramañjarī does not criticise the definition of this type given by Bhānudatta or any other writer. From Bharata downwards she has been defined in identical terms by all writers. There are only two points to be noted here One, the Śrngāramañjarī brings Pranaya-kalaha as giving rise to a sub-variety here. Another, while discussing the Khanditā as being characterised basically by Kopa, our text legitimately faces the question of how the Khanditā and Kalahāntarītā would then differ (p. 23). It answers that, no doubt, at the time when the anger is up, the Kalahāntarītā too is a Khanditā; but her distinctness comes, when the mood of quarrel has subsided and the dominant feeling is repentance and sorrow at having brushed aside the lover who again and again explained, entreated and even prostrated. This is more clearly stated by our author later while dealing with the division into Uttamā etc.

The name Kalahāntarītā is obviously to be interpreted as 'separated' (antarītā-vyavahitā) by quarrel (kalaha), that is how the Śrngāramañjarī appears to take it (p. 23); but the Āmoda says that it means 'one severed from happiness owing to quarrel'.

कलहे सति मु(सु)खेनान्तरिता व्यवहिता । P. 314

Vakrokti-garvitā (p. 29). In the above-discussed special group of three, given by Bhānūdatta, this is the only heroine which the Śrngāramañjarī accepts as an independent Nāyikā, but the work adds it as the ninth in the traditionally handed down set of eight Avasthā-Nāyikās. The characteristic of this type is clear from the simple name itself and the Śrngāramañjarī has no discussion here. As in the case of Anya-sambhogaduhkhitā, here too the Rasamañjarī does not define the type but only illustrates it in two varieties, Prema-garvitā and Saundaryagarvitā. The only originality exhibited here by our text is in the varieties and the sub-varieties formulated by it under this heading.

Prosita-bhartṛkā (pp. 32-3): The old Prosita-bhartṛkā was only the lady whose husband had gone away on a journey owing to some work etc. But as has been shown above while reviewing the poems depicting this situation of Pravāsa, as in Hāla's Saptasatī and Āmaru's Sataka, poets had loved to draw the more delicate picture of a lady whose husband is just leaving or will shortly leave. While, in Bharata or Rudrabhaṭṭa, we do not come across these two Pravāsa-situations, we have in the Saptasatī one verse using actually the name Bhavīsyat-patīkā. The Daśarūpaka, though it gives in II. 27 only the type in which the husband has gone on a journey, in IV. 65 under Pravāsa-vipralambha, speaks of all the three varieties of Pravāsa, Bhāvin, Bhavan and Bhūta; and the Avaloka, while illustrating these three, cites the Saptasatī verse referred to above for the journey to be, a couple of verses from Āmaru for the journey that has just begun, and a verse from Meghasandēśa for the well-known Pravāsa that has taken place.

The Rasamañjarī tackles this question not under the Proṣitapatikā, as it ought to, but at the end of its treatment of the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās; there too, it does not speak of the case where the Pravāsa is just taking place, but only that in which it is imminent, Pravatsyat-patīkā. It shows elaborately how this type cannot go under any of the eight already dealt with, and hence should be the ninth variety. It definitely says that the Pravatsyat-patīkā cannot be included in the Prosita-patīkā as the husband is near-by in the former, whereas in the latter, he is to be away, तस्याः प्रेषितपतिकविप्रलम्बोत्कासु नान्तर्भावः । भर्तुस्सन्निधिवर्तितात् । p. 184, Benares edn. Bhānūdatta then illustrates the sub-varieties of the Pravatsyat-patīkā.

The Āmoda has a fairly long discussion here. It is against creating a ninth variety for the Pravāsa to be, for on that score it argues that an Abhisārikā to be and a Khanditā to be, will have to be recognised, therefore it is best to abide by the traditional eightfold classification इत्याद्युदाहरणानुरोधादभिसरिष्यन्तीति * * * इत्याद्युदाहरणानुरोधाच्च भाविखण्डितेत्यादयोऽनन्तनायिकाः स्युः, अतोऽनवस्थाभिरेभिः यथासंप्रदायमष्टविधत्वमेवादर्थव्यम्, किं नायिकान्तरकल्पनागौरवेण । p. 442. The Āmoda suggests also, as I have noted in the footnote on p. 33 of the text here, that if the Pravatsyat-patīkā is to be recognised, the best way to deal with the question is to designate the one common Nāyikā for Pravāsa as the Pravāsa-patīkā and recognise three varieties for her, Bhūta-pati-pravāsavati, Vartamāna-pati-pravāsavati and Bhāvi-pati-pravāsavati. This 'Pravāsa-patīkā' is the fresh name, Nāmāntara, which the Śrngāramañjarī says the Āmoda wants to create:

तस्या नामान्तरं कल्पनीयमिति स्वग्रन्थे लिखितवन्तः । p. 32

Earlier, the Āmoda suggests that it is needless to recognise, as the Rasamañjarī does, a ninth Nāyikā called Pravatsyat-patikā as she can well be included in Proṣita-patikā herself, i.e., without having recourse to devising for her a new comprehensive name like Pravāsa-patikā. The Āmoda says further, the grammatical point that the participle 'Proṣita' means only a past action need not 'be made much of, for it is not the exact grammatical meaning of the word Proṣita that constitutes this type, it is the theme of Pravāsa in general which is one whole unit comprehending all phases beginning from the very talk about it, that is really meant.

अत्रेदं चिन्त्यम्—प्रवत्स्यत्पतिकायाः प्रोषितपतिकायामेव अन्तर्भावसंभवे नवमत्वकल्पनायां गौरवत्वात् संप्रदायविरोधाच्च । ननु प्रपूर्वद्विसतेः भूतार्थकप्रत्यये * * * कथमस्याः (स्यां) प्रवत्स्यत्पतिकायां (याः) अन्तर्भावः । * * * अज्ञोऽसि । न हि प्रोषितशब्दावयवार्थसंभवमात्रेण प्रोषितमर्तृकात्वं संभवति * * * समुदायस्य शक्तिमभ्युपगम्य प्रवत्स्यत्पतिका वि(च)प्रोषितपतिकायामेवान्तर्भाव्यताम् । pp. 438—9.

Sāmarāja adopts this same view and similarly refines the definition of Pravāsa as one continuity from leaving contact with a former place to establishing contact with a fresh place (p. 159, 1938 Reprint)

The position of the Āmoda has been set forth at some length above to elucidate the stand taken by the Śrngāramañjarī. It is the way-out shown by the author of the Āmoda that our author resorts to. Leaving the form Pravāsa-patikā, he takes Proṣita-patikā itself as the common name, which includes Pravāsas referring to the three times, future, present and past. Instead of however taking, as the Āmoda does, a stand on the whole Pravāsa being a thematic unit and on the general reasonableness of understanding by the past passive participle all the three tenses, the Śrngāramañjarī proceeds grammatically to prove that Proṣita can comprehend the closely proximate moments of the present and future too; from the grammatical viewpoint again, the Śrngāramañjarī shows that, instead of proposing a fresh emendation of the name as Pravāsa-patikā, the word 'Proṣita' itself can be understood as meaning Pravāsa. Examples are also cited from classical writings where the past passive participle has present and future significance. The definitions of the Proṣita-patikā given in the Rasamañjarī and the Pratāparudriya, which are then cited, are accordingly modified to comprehend the Pravāsat- and Pravatsyat-patikā, here again the Śrngāramañjarī enlarges the old definition by dropping reference to the time element,—Patī-pravāsa-khinnā Proṣitabhartrakā.

How Viśveśvara has solved this question in his Rasacandrikā has already been referred to (see above p. 29)

On the actual definition of the Pravatsyat-patikā, the Śrngāramañjarī cites the Rasamañjarī which says that she is one whose husband is to go away on travel the next moment, agrīmakṣane. The Āmoda explains that by Kṣaṇa, moment, is meant neither such a distance of time as an year after which the lover's journey may come off nor an exact moment itself which cannot give scope for details like ceremonial preparations of a religious character and otherwise, leave taking, grief-laden talk, looks etc. Agrīma-kṣana is only an upalakṣana and has to be reasonably interpreted. Therefore, it is wholly needless for the Śrngāramañjarī to have made a criticism of the Rasamañjarī on this point, to have argued that the travel may begin in a day or two and to have offered the modified definition that the Pravatsyat-patikā is one who learns of her husband's preparations for travel and becomes grief-stricken.

As noted already, both in the Saptasatī and the Amaruśataka, we find the instance of a Parvatsyat-patikā, at the sight of whose anguish the lover drops his programmed travel. This delicate and charming situation is noted by our author and mentioned as a sub-variety called Vigalita-prasthāna-patikā under the Pravatsyat-patikā (pp. 34-35).

Abhisārikā (P. 37): The two varieties of Abhisārikā, she who goes to meet her lover and she who brings the lover to herself (abhisarati and abhisārayati) and their history have already been set forth above. Despite the antiquity of the two varieties and the importance of the authorities who accept both as varieties of the Abhisārikā, the Śrngāramañjarī and those works which take its view appear to be justified in rejecting the second variety. The Śrngāramañjarī quotes first the definition in the Rasamañjarī which recognises both and then the Āmoda's comment which justifies the two kinds. According to the Śrngāramañjarī, the second variety is to be brought under the Vāsakasajjikā. The Āmoda foresees this view and replies that turn or Vāra is necessary for the arrival of the lover in the case of Vāsakasajjikā and there is no such Vāra associated with the lover's arrival here. Against this the Śrngāramañjarī advances the same explanation that it offered earlier when it brought the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā under the Vāsakasajjikā. Vāsaka, it has shown, has many meanings besides Vāra.

Uttamā etc (P. 39). This is a separate and basic classification which, as can be seen from the historical survey given above, is handed down from Bhāṭata. In its application to varieties of Nāyikās, the Rasamañjarī defines it on the basis of the degree of goodness towards the lover evinced by the beloved, thus the Uttamā or the best is that lady who behaves favourably towards her lover even when his behaviour is unfavourable.

This definition, the Āmoda rightly thinks, requires to be modified, as there is no question of any favourable act on the part of the beloved in the Khanditā and the Kalahāntarītā types and in the Svādhīnapatikā type where there is nothing else but favourable attitude all the time. So, according to the Āmoda, the Uttamā means in all the types a greater refinement of the type-characteristic; if the characteristic is anger for instance, Uttamā will mean less of anger; if the characteristic is favourableness, Uttamā will mean a further degree of the same attitude. The Śrngāramañjarī does not accept the Āmoda's explanation. It would take the Uttamā as one who does more favourable acts than those done by the lover, the Madhyamā as one whose favourable acts are equal to those of her lover and the Adhamā as one whose favourable acts are less than those of her lover. What exact form these three take in each Nāyikā, as also in the Sakhī, the Śrngāramañjarī shows elaborately; but as a compendious definition, what it has given is not less open to flaws than the one in the Rasamañjarī or the Āmoda; for, in Khanditā, Kalahāntarītā and Vipralabdā there is no question at all of the favourable acts of the Nāyaka (Priya-hita)

(iii) Classifications

In the tabular statement of the Nāyaka-Nāyikā varieties recognised by the author of the Śrngāramañjarī, which I have given at the end of this Introduction, I have indicated by italics the new varieties introduced by our author. In view of that and the historical survey already given, it is not necessary to go here at any great length into the question of the classification of these varieties. It would suffice if a brief review is made of the new varieties or names proposed by our text, particularly in relation to the texts of the Rasamañjarī and the Āmoda thereon.

1 NĀYIKĀS.—Under Madhyā, the Śrngāramañjarī introduces two sub-varieties Pracchanna-madhyā and Prakāśa-madhyā; in the former, the fact of the heroine being in the stage when love and bashfulness hold equal sway over her is known only to her lover; in the latter, her having reached this stage is known also to her friends.

2. The Rasamañjarī restricts the Pragalbhā to the Svīyā; the Śrngāramañjarī extends her to the Parakiyā and Sāmānyā also. This extension is based on the Āmoda.

3. Under Pragalbhā, the Rasamañjarī gives no varieties, but mentions only two of her Cestās, her desire for enjoyment and becoming lost in it. The two varieties Ratī-prītimatī and Ratyānanda-paravaśā introduced by our text are therefore derived only from the two Cestās mentioned by Bhānudatta. On this point of sub-varieties recognised later being derived from the descriptive epithets or leading characteristics mentioned by earlier writers, see above Introduction p. 20 para 3, and fn. 2.

4. The types Dhīrā etc were restricted by earlier writers to the Svīyā, the Rasamañjarī extends them to the Parakīyā and the Śrngāramañjarī follows it and extends them to the Sāmānyā also. The Āmoda disagrees with the Rasamañjarī and follows the earlier writers

5. The Śrngāramañjarī introduces as the first sub-classification under the Parakīyā the two varieties, Udbodhitā and Udbuddhā, not mentioned by others. This is an important innovation, for the consideration whether a Parakīyā has been tempted by a paramour or she has herself felt attracted to him is an essential matter. I have already pointed out how Vātsyāyana dwells on this aspect (see above p. 19) Under the sub-variety Nipunā here, the Rasamañjarī speaks only of two kinds, clever in speech and clever in action; the third kind mentioned in our text, clever in deceiving the husband, Pati-vañcana-nipunā, is, as the text itself says (p. 6), suggested by the Āmoda (pp 175-7, see fn p. 6 of the text) The two kinds Pracchanna-laksitā and Prakāśa-laksitā under the Laksitā are additions made by our text. Laksitā herself means one whose love affair is known to others; as such a Pracchanna-laksitā would appear to be a misnomer, our text, as usual, makes a subtle distinction in the degree of secrecy or publicity, in the Pracchanna-laksitā, the friends exercise their powers of observation and deduce her love affair, in the latter, everybody can see in the way she looks or acts that she has a clandestine love-affair Under this latter, our text speaks of four kinds, Kulaṭā, Muditā, Anuśāyanā and Sāhasikā The last, as our text itself says, is taken from the Āmoda (pp. 175-7, see text p 6 fn.) The other three are older names found in the Rasamañjarī. There is, however, a difference in the way these varieties are given here in the Śrngāramañjarī; Bhānudatta gives Guptā, Nipunā, Laksitā, Kulaṭā, Anuśāyanā and Muditā only, and these in one series; but the Śrngāramañjarī constitutes the first three into one sub-group and gives the latter three as sub-classes under a second variety of the third of the first triad, Laksitā Under Anuśāyanā, the Rasamañjarī mentions in a descriptive manner three kinds, the Śrngāramañjarī says that it gives specific names to these three (p 11), thus Viḡhatita-sanketā, Aprāpta-bhāvi-sanketā and Śankita-jāra-gamanā under the Anuśāyanā in our own text are derived only from the Rasamañjarī As noted here by our text and as pointed out by me in the footnote (p. 11), the Āmoda indicates the possibility of many kinds of Anuśāyanā. It is not as if the Āmoda speaks of many possible varieties of Anuśāyanā only, under the immediately preceding Muditā, the Āmoda gives with illustrations (and this has not been noticed by the author of the Śrngāramañjarī) varieties of Muditā like Jāra-darśana-muditā, Darśanamātra-vīsrastanīvī, Jāra-kathā-śravaṇa-muditā, Tadiya-śabda-śravaṇa-mu., Nāma-grahana-mu., Dhyāna-mu., and Sangama-mu. Similarly, under Vāgvidagdhā too (pp 187-8), the Āmoda mentions and illustrates the further sub-varieties, one who employs double entendre, śliṣṭa-vacana, and of a Sakhī who is a Vāgvidagdhā. It appears, therefore, significant that, just in this context, our author, in making his reference to the Āmodakāra whom he admires, calls him a Praudha (p 11)

6. The Rasamañjarī has no varieties under the Sāmānyā; nor does the Āmoda give here any The author of the Śrngāramañjarī says that he gives here five varieties not spoken of in other works (p. 73) These five original varieties are Svatantrā, independent, Jananyadhīnā, under her mother's control, Niyamitā, engaged to one, Kṛpānurāgā, having real love to one, and Kalpitanurāgā, feigning love for money (pp 13-14)

7. Under the Svādhīna-patīkā, the Śrngāramañjarī gives two special varieties, the Dūtī-vañcīkā and Bhāvi-śankitā; these have been explained above. These are also new additions made by our author. (pp 16-17).

8. The only variety under the Vāsakasajjikā not mentioned in the Rasamañjarī and mentioned in the Śrngāramañjarī is the Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā This figures in the discussions under the Pravatsyat-patikā in the Āmoda, and as seen there, has been discussed in the work Vilāsaratnākara also (see p 17 of text, fn.)

9. Under the Virahotkanthitā, the Śrngāramañjarī says first that the earlier writers gave five varieties. This refers to the Rasamañjarī and the five common varieties Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā given therein. The Śrngāramañjarī adds two new and special varieties here, Kārya-vilambita-suratā, one whose union with the lord is being delayed by preoccupation with work and Anutpanna-sambhogā, one for whom union with her lover has not yet happened, this latter refers to the heroine in Pūrvānūrāga-vipralambha, and owing to the variety of circumstances under which her love for the lover might have been created, she falls into four kinds, pining after seeing the lover, after hearing about him, and after seeing him in a picture or dream, Darśana-anutāpitā, Śravaṇa-anu, Citra-anu and Svapna-anu. These sub-varieties also are new additions made by our author.

Now regarding the two main additional varieties mentioned above, Anutpanna-sambhogā and Kārya-vilambita-suratā, there is reason to believe that the Śrngāramañjarī deduced these from the detailed discussion of the issues relating to the definition of the Virahotkanthitā in the Āmoda, two varieties of this type with regard to whom the Rasamañjarī-definition is said to be too narrow, avyāpta, are those like Damayantī who have yet to meet their lovers of whom they have heard, and those who, remaining at home, have their union delayed by domestic work.

प्रियतमप्राथमिकसंभोगप्रागभावोत्कृष्टितासु दमयन्त्यादिषु, भवन एव प्रोषितकार्यान्तरासक्तप्रियविलम्बोन्मनस्कासु * * * चाव्याप्तम् । * * * प्राथमिकसंभोगप्रागभावोत्कृष्टिता यथा * * * भवने प्रेयोऽनागमनोत्कृष्टिता यथा * * * । Pp 345—6

Two more varieties conditioned by the two other varieties of Vipralambha, Sāpa and Marana, are also added by the Āmoda

10. Of the two varieties of Vipralambhā given in our text, the first, Nāyaka-vañcitā, is the common type; the second, Sakhī-vañcitā, is not the creation of our author, for we find the Āmoda discussing and rejecting it.

11. The speciality in the treatment of the Khanditā in the Śrngāramañjarī is that it brings the three varieties Dhīrā etc, and the two, Mānavatī and Anya-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, under it. The Śrngāramañjarī says that by Anya-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, the earlier writers (including Bhānudatta) meant only the Dūtī-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, but it would add thereunder other varieties, a Dūtī-samāsakti-duḥkhitā, one upset on learning of the lover's attempt to enjoy the Dūtī, Itara-ratī-śruti-khinā, one who is upset on hearing of the lover having enjoyed the company of another Nāyikā and Īrsyā-garvitā, one who, out of her jealousy at the lover's relation with another lady, gives vent to her angry and haughty words before others

12. The only peculiarity regarding Kalahāntarītā is the inclusion here of Pranaya-kalaha as giving rise to the second variety. Pranaya-kalaha itself is no new idea.

13. The Vakroktigarvitā has only two varieties in the Rasamañjarī, Prema-garvitā and Saundarya-garvitā. The Śrngāramañjarī adds Saubhāgya-garvitā and Naipūṇya-garvitā in the main group; under Saundarya-garvitā, it adds sub-varieties Smita-garvitā, Yauvana-garvitā, Saukumārya-garvitā and Vilāsa-garvitā, the last being specially mentioned as its own contribution. From the last observation, it is clear that the Śrngāramañjarī lays no claim to originality for the other additional Garvitā-varieties. In fact, they are all taken from the Āmoda, which the Śrngāramañjarī does not however fail to mention in this context. The Āmoda adds the Yauvana-garvitā and the Naipūṇyādi-guṇa-garvitā. It gives the Saubhāgya-garvitā with illustration, but as noted in the Śrngāramañjarī, it includes her in Prema-garvitā; Saubhāgya and Preman are distinct as cause and effect according to the Śrngāramañjarī. The Āmoda gives also with illustrations the Smita- and Saukumārya-garvitās, but considers them included in Saundarya-garvitā (pp 251-253)

यौवनगर्वितादयोऽपि सन्ति । यौवनगर्विता यथा * * स्मितसौकुमार्यगर्वितयोः सौन्दर्यगर्विताया-

14. The three classes of the Prosita-patīkā, with reference to the three times, past, present and future, have been foreshadowed in literature; the Rasamañjarī, however, discusses only the future-variety, Pravatsyat-patīkā, the Āmoda discusses the whole question and there is therefore no new addition here, which the Śrngāramañjarī can be said to have introduced. The Vigalita-prasthāna-patīkā, though foreshadowed in literature, has, however, been clearly formulated for the first time only in our text (p. 34). Under the past-variety, Prosita-patīkā, a new addition made by our text is a variety called Sakhyanutāpitā, which appears to be a needless minor innovation; she is the Prosita-patīkā lady whose friend too has gone on some travel and is thus not by her side to console her

15. Under Abhisārikā, the Śrngāramañjarī rejects the second variety mentioned in the Rasamañjarī, she who makes the lover go to her. The Parakīyā-Abhisārikā is given in the Rasamañjarī three sub-varieties, she who goes out in moonlight, in darkness and during day. (Jyotsnā-abhi, Tamo'abhi, and Divā-abhi.). The Śrngāramañjarī adds here three more, Garva-abhi., one who is proud and having come to her lover's place, pretends to have come on some other work, Kāmābhisārikā, whom later (p 40) our author calls the Uttamā-abhi, one who goes out under the sway of exceeding infatuation, and Premavākya-abhi., a special addition, which means one who goes out, meets the lover and has a loving conversation with him, in the last case, the beloved appears to have sought the meeting to enjoy tete-a-tete with her lover

The Hindi work Rasikapriya is cited here (p 37) as giving a variety called Prema-abhi, which the Śrngāramañjarī rejects on the ground that all Abhisārikās are prompted only by Preman, love

16. The additions made by the Śrngāramañjarī under the Sakhi and the functions and acts of the Dūtī and the Śukhī are of minor importance and can be noted from the tabular statement given below. The Svayam-dūtī is somewhat important, but the Śrngāramañjarī has no discussion on it; in the historical survey given at the beginning, I have noticed the views of other writers on the Svayam-dūtī

17. NĀYAKAS The Rasamañjarī gives the second group of Nāyaka-classification as comprising only four varieties, Anukūla, Dakṣiṇa, Dṛṣṭa and Śaṭha. The Śrngāramañjarī adds here the Mānin and the Catura, who are of course mentioned by Bhānūdutta, but who are, as our text says, included by him in the Śaṭha. (Rasamañjarī p 219, p 49 of text here) Under Dhrṣṭa, our text adds Dhūrta, not a new name, as a sub-variety.

18. The Rasamañjarī gives also a Prosita-variety of the Nāyaka; the Śrngāramañjarī adds to this the Āmlita and Virahin and makes these three as a separate group of Nāyaka-classification. None of these names is new, as has been shown in the section on Nāyakas in the historical survey given above. The Āmoda, which text our author keeps immediately before him, adds the Ayukta and the Virahin to the Prosita given in the Rasamañjarī (pp 544-9)

(iv)

As the author of the Śrngāramañjarī kept the Rasamañjarī before him, we might compare here the topics dealt with in both these texts and see what topics touched by Bhānūdatta have been left out by our author and what additional topics our author has introduced. At the very outset, our author informs us of the special points to be noted in his treatment, which might also be reviewed in this connection.

(a) Bhānudatta's treatment of each Nāyikā includes besides definition and illustration a statement, with illustrations, of phases of behaviour characteristic of each type, referred to compendiously as Cestā. As Ananta Bhatta points out, these Cestās are, in addition to the definitions, for the correct grasp of the nature of each Nāyikā (svarūpa-grahana), and as noted already in the historical survey (p. 20 above), earlier works devoted some attention to this aspect. It is no doubt true that some of the constituents of the definitions of the Nāyikā-varieties, as well as the formulation of sub-varieties, in later texts are based on these Cestās or descriptions of phases of characteristic behaviour given in earlier works; still a regular statement of the Cestās as found in the Rasamañjarī is desirable as helping the further understanding of the nature of each type, and this is not given in the Śrīngāramañjarī.

(b) At the end of its treatment of the Nāyakas, the Rasamañjarī discusses the question, which our text omits, whether or not the varieties caused by Avasthās, such as have been shown for the Nāyikās, are to be had for the Nāyakas too, whether or not we have varieties of Nāyakas other than the four Anukūla, Dakṣiṇa, Śātha and Dhṛsta; whether, for example, we cannot have varieties of Nāyakas like Utkā, Vipralabdha and Khandita corresponding to the Nāyikās of those names. An Utkā would be a Nāyaka yearning for the Nāyikā's arrival, Vipralabdha, one deceived by her and so on. Bhānudatta discountenances this as absurd. This is a question not dealt with by our text. But we find our text, like the Āmoda, giving the three Nāyaka types Prosita, Amīlita and the Virahin, the first of which is given by Bhānudatta himself.

Besides these, Bhānudatta himself, as also other writers on this subject, speak of three main Nāyaka-types Patī, Upatī and Vaiśika. It is not as if these Nāyaka-varieties, which have been accepted, have no correspondence to the Nāyikā-varieties recognised. Upatī is the hero figuring in the love of the Parakīyā; Vaiśika pairs with Sāmānyā, Anukūla goes with Svādhīnapatīkā; Dakṣiṇa, Śātha and Dhṛsta would figure in the love of the Khanditā, Vipralabdhā and Kalahāntarītā; Amīlita and Virahin are the corresponding Nāyakas for the Virahotkanthitā in her varieties Anutpanna-sambhogā and Kārya-vilambitā-suratā, Proṣita, recognised by Bhānudatta, is clearly the Nāyaka for the Prosita-patīkā. That the very recognition of Prosita cuts against Bhānudatta's criticism of a corresponding Nāyaka-series is shown by Ananta Bhatta in his gloss कथमन्यथा प्रोषितभेदमुदाहृतवान् स्वयमिति यत्किञ्चिदेतत् । Pp 227-8.

There is however another aspect to this question raised by Bhānudatta which would justify his fear that the recognition of similar Nāyaka-types would result in Rasābhāsa. By corresponding Nāyaka-varieties, we have got to understand not the Nāyakas figuring in the love of the respective Nāyikā-types, but as explained by me first, Nāyakas who get similar treatment at the hands of the Nāyikās, thus an Avasthā-Nāyaka corresponding to the Prosita-bhartṛkā-Nāyikā would be not the Prosita-Patī, the hero who has gone abroad and caused the suffering of separation for the heroine, but a lover whose beloved has gone on travel, leaving him in yearning, a Khandita-Nāyaka would mean a lover who is jealous of his beloved owing to her relations with another Nāyaka; a Vipralabdha-Nāyaka would similarly be the lover whom the expected beloved has deceived and disappointed. Bhānudatta is correct when he says that all this is not in vogue in literature (asampradāya) and fraught with Rasābhāsa.

(c) Under Proṣitabhartṛkā, Bhānudatta says that her suffering passes through the ten recognised stages of separation, daśa avasthās, leading up eventually to death. To the enumeration and illustration of these ten states, Bhānudatta devotes some space at the end of his work (pp 236-245). These ten states are just mentioned as characterising the highest type of love, uttama-anurāga (p. 53, line 2) but are not enumerated, described or illustrated in the Śrīngāramañjarī.

As regards topics additionally introduced in the Śrngāramañjarī, the only subject not altogether touched in the Rasamañjarī is, as the Śrngāramañjarī itself says at the outset, the fourfold classification of Nāyikās into Padminī etc., which is more germane to regular Kāmaśāstra works and which only some Hindi works on the subject and some later works like the Mandāramaranda Campū take into consideration, and the four Nāyaka-types of similar vogue in works of erotics, Bhadra, Datta etc.

Among its special features, the Śrngāramañjarī speaks of 'fresh elaboration'. Such elaboration is seen prominently in (a) the elucidation of the Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā for each and every kind of Nāyikā and even for the Sakhī on pp. 39-41 and (b) the enumeration and illustration of the functions and the acts of the friend and messenger, which takes as many as nine pages (41-49) (c) The subject of Rasa, which is just touched upon in the Rasamañjarī, but which Bhānudatta deals with in another whole work of his, the Rasataranginī, is given a succinct exposition by our author at the end of the work. The reference made here to the Rasamañjarī-kāra's view is to Bhānudatta's separate work on Rasa, the Rasataranginī. (P 52) (d) A general tendency at elaboration is seen in another direction all through the work, in the treatment of the Nāyikā-varieties. For some of these elaborations which it refers to at the outset, the work takes credit. The critical discussions here are generally much more elaborate than in the Rasamañjarī. The increase in the number of Nāyikā-varieties has already been noted.

Regarding illustrations, the work says that its illustrations are more precise than those given in the earlier treatises; see especially its statement under the Svādhīnapatikā

(p. 15): प्राचीना वक्रोक्तिगर्वितासंकीर्णानि स्वाधीनपतिकोदाहरणानि लिखितवन्तः । वयमसंकीर्णानि लिखामः ।

In the case of every Nāyikā-variety, the work first gives a general illustration, and then only classifies and illustrates the sub-classes; this again is a speciality of its treatment claimed by the work itself (सर्वस्थलेषु साधारणलक्षणानां साधारणोदाहरणानि विरचय्य)

This elaboration is not devoid of needless repetition; for, almost regularly, the types are once defined and classified in the discussion-portion (carcā-grantha) and then again enumerated and defined in the definition-portion (laksana-grantha).

Whenever necessary, the Śrngāramañjarī says that it also abridges the treatment (संक्षेपकरणस्थले संक्षेपं कृत्वा) p. 2. The topics dealt with by Bhānudatta but left out by our author, which have already been noted, would come under this abridgement. Jyesthā and Kanisthā are illustrated by Bhānudatta in three sub-classes, but the Śrngāramañjarī gives only a single illustration for them (p.7). Under Mudītā and Anuśayānā (p. 11), the Āmoda mentions a large number of sub-varieties, but the Śrngāramañjarī expresses itself in favour of a briefer treatment of varieties here. The Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā varieties of Nāyakas are illustrated by Bhānudatta, but the Śrngāramañjarī, which has elaborated so many topics, omits their illustration out of fear of undue length. (p. 51). Similarly, it omits (p. 51) illustrations for Pīthamarda, Vidūṣaka, Viṭa and Ceta. Such omissions may be justified only on the ground that the main preoccupation of our author is the Nāyikā-types. But one cannot help feeling that, having been very elaborate up to the end of the Sakhī and Dūtī, our text rushes over the remaining topics and hustles towards the end.

Among other claims made by our author at the opening of the work are: Formulation of new varieties on the basis of instances in literature, where poets have delineated them प्राचीनोदाहरणानुसारेण नायिकाभेदान् कल्पयित्वा । This is well-illustrated by varieties like Pravasat-patikā and Vigalita-prasthāna-patikā. Coining of specific names for the Nāyikā-varieties where earlier writers gave no names येषां नामानि न सन्ति तेषां नामानि स्थापयित्वा ।

Detailed Summary of the Contents of the Śrngāramañjarī

P 1. Introductory Verses (1-16). Obeisance to the preceptor and deities (śl. 1); obeisance to the preceptor (probably Bande Nawāz Geesu Darāz) (śl. 2).

Obeisance to Bande Nawāz Hazarat (Geesu Darāz) (śl. 3); tracing of the ancestry of the author of the work from Geesu Darāz (śls 4-12); Śāharāja born in the line of Geesu Darāz (śl. 4), his three sons Śāharāja, Sahanapesarullāh, and Akbar Shah (śl. 5); the second, Sahanapesarullāh, had a son named Śāharāja, who was a royal preceptor (śl. 6); his (eldest) son was Akbar Shah known as Bade Sāheb (śl. 7), praise of Bade Sāheb (śls 8-9); his two younger brothers were Mīr Sāheb and Śāha Sāheb (śls. 10-11); praise again of Bade Sāheb Akbar (śls 12-14).

P 2 Akbar himself (svayam) wrote in Telugu the work Śrngāramañjarī (śl. 15); this is the Sanskrit version of that Telugu work of Akbar (śl. 16)

Prose passage describing again Bade Sāheb Akbar Śāha as endowed with literary and artistic gifts, as being devoted to (his father) Śāharāja, the preceptor of Sultan Abul Hasan, the patron of arts and letters, and as writing the work Śrngāramañjarī.

Mention of the sources on which the Śrngāramañjarī is based: Rasamañjarī, Āmoda and Parimala, Śrngāratilaka, Rasikapriya, Rasārnava, Pratāparudriya, Sundaraśrngāra, Narasakāvya, Daśarūpaka, Vilāsarātnākara, Kāvya-parīksā and Kāvya-prakāśa; statement about the method adopted in this work and its special features. It is stated that the definitions in the earlier works mentioned above are adopted wherever they were found to be acceptable and rejected wherever they were found to be otherwise, that (new) classes of heroines have been created on the basis of the verses in the poetry of earlier writers depicting various classes of heroines, and definitions and illustrations have been supplied in the cases of those Nāyikā-types for which earlier texts did not provide these; that names of Nāyikā-types have been coined wherever they were lacking in earlier works; that sometimes the old names have been improved upon; that the treatment has been made elaborate or brief as and when necessary; that, in all cases, the main types are first given each a general illustration; that a few old illustrations have also been utilised and quoted; that the discussions are in prose and illustrations in verses; that besides the different Nāyikā-types, together with their definitions and illustrations, some details of the Śrngārarasa, the chief of the nine Rasas, such as its Sāttvikabhāvas, are also dealt with; that the classification of heroines into the types Padmīnī etc., which previous works of this branch of study did not give, are also dealt with here.

Definition of Nāyikā (heroine) in general as the lady who is the object of love; illustration of heroine in general (śl. 17).

P. 3 The heroine is of three kinds Svīyā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā, one's own wife, another's wife and the public woman.

Citation of the definition of the first, Svīyā, given in the Rasamañjarī that Svīyā is the lady who is devoted solely to her lord; its refutation; the word 'eva' 'solely' is criticised as pointless; for if, as is meant by it, one should be attached only to her lord, a Svīyā can never become a Parakīyā; and it is a Svīyā who becomes a Parakīyā. If 'eva' is not used, it might be argued that the definition would apply also to the Parakīyā, who has love to her wedded husband also; the author replies that love as such for a Parakīyā is always for her paramour, never for her wedded husband. The above-noted purpose of the word 'eva' in the definition has been pointed out in the Āmoda which says that even a Parakīyā enjoys her wedded husband's company and so far she has love towards him too. Criticism of this view of love or Anurāga. Anurāga, the author says, is not mere desire for enjoyment, even that desire which the Parakīyā shows to her wedded husband is ultimately to keep her wedded husband in good humour or under a wrong impression, so that she might privately carry on with her paramour.

Therefore, Svīyā according to the author is to be defined as one devoted to her lord, here too, the word lord, 'Svāmin', could be substituted by the word 'wedded husband'. If this Svīyā is so devoted for life, she is called Pativrātā.

She is classified into Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, the adolescent, the grown up and the fully grown.

Illustration of Svīyā in general (śl. 18). Mugdhā dealt with; citation of the Rasamañjarī-definition of Mugdhā that she is one in whom youth has just sprouted; criticism of this that this would apply to Parakīyā and Sāmānyā; further, in the present enquiry into Nāyikā-types, qualities are taken as differentia, not age; citation of the Mugdhā-definition in the Pratāparudrīya that she is one whose love is overcome by bashfulness; criticism of this that it would not include the sub-variety of Mugdhā called Ajñātayauvanā; this is a stage in which the heroine is just being put in the way; even bashfulness is not so developed as to subjugate her love which too is in an undeveloped state; it may be argued that such a girl, with neither love nor bashfulness, is not a Nāyikā at all, the reply is that she is a Nāyikā in so far as these would presently appear in her; the author's own definition of Mugdhā that she is one who is innocent of the fine appreciation of man (her husband)

Mugdhā further classified into one not conscious of her youth and one conscious of the same, Ajñāta-yauvanā and Jñāta-yauvanā.

P. 4 Three illustrations of Mugdhā in general (śls. 19-21).

Definition of the first Mugdhā-variety, Ajñātayauvanā, as one who does not even know of the birth of youth in herself; illustration, Jñātayauvanā defined as one who has known the birth of youth in herself, and further classified into Navodhā, the newly-wedded who is bashful and timid, and the Visrabdhā-navodhā, the newly wedded who has gained an amount of confidence and self-possession, and allows herself to be fondled by her husband; illustration of the Jñātayauvanā in general, definitions and illustrations of the Navodhā and the Visrabdhā-navodhā

Madhyā then dealt with, the Rasamañjarī-view that the Madhyā is a further advancement over the Visrabdhā-navodhā, and hence called Ati-visrabdhā, criticised, the quality of 'newly-wedded' applies only to Mugdhā; and the quality of 'great confidence' would apply only to Pragalbhā; and the two cannot be in Madhyā. It may be argued that it is after all the circumstance of first union that is meant by Navodhātva; if this first union happens for a Mugdhā, she is Navodhā; if it happens for a Madhyā, she is Ati-visrabdhā-navodhā; but the author disapproves of this view, as in such an interpretation of Navodhātva, it would become applicable to Pragalbhās like the highly grown-up princesses and courtezans.

Definition of Madhyā as one over whom love and bashfulness have equal sway; her further varieties given as two, Pracchanna and Prakāśa.

P. 5. Madhyā illustrated in general (śls 26, 27); Pracchanna and Prakāśa Madhyās defined as those whose states of love as being in equal measure with their bashfulness are known, respectively, to the lover only, and to her friends also. Illustrations of these two varieties (śls 29).

Pragalbhā: Citation of the definition of Pragalbhā in the Rasamañjarī that she is one who is an adept in the art of love with reference solely to her wedded husband; criticism that the condition 'solely with reference to her wedded husband' should not be added, as this would mean that the Parakīyā and Sāmānyā cannot be Pragalbhās; that those two have no Mugdhātva or Madhyātva but have Pragalbhātva is a matter of undeniable experience, therefore, the Rasamañjarī-definition of Pragalbhā would apply to Svīyā-Pragalbhā only, citation and adoption of the definition given in the Āmoda that Pragalbhā consists of the subjugation of bashfulness by love. Pragalbhā proposed to be defined and illustrated with reference to the main type called Svīyā.

Definition and illustration of Pragalbhā in general (śl. 30), Svīyā-Pragalbhā defined and classified into Ratī-prīti-matī and Ratyānanda-paravaśā, one that desires to have the husband's company frequently and one that forgets oneself in the bliss of that enjoyment.

Illustration of Svīyā-Pragalbhā in general (śl. 31). Definitions and illustrations of Ratī-prīti-matī and Ratyānanda-paravaśā (śls. 32, 33).

P 6 Classification of Madhyā and Pragalbhā dealt with above into three classes. Dhīrā, Adhīrā and Dhīrā-adhīrā, the self-possessed, the un-self-possessed and one who is partly self-possessed and partly not. Consideration of the view of the older writers that this classification into Dhīrā etc., pertains only to Svīyā, examination of the views expressed on this point in the Rasamañjarī and the Āmoda, the former extending it to Parakīyā and Sāmānyā also and the latter not agreeing with this extension. As these varieties Dhīrā etc. are based on the appearance of anger in the heroine, these varieties can be had according to the Rasamañjarī, but the Āmoda says that there is little scope for anger in a Parakīyā for whom union itself with the paramour is hard of attainment and whose love has to be guarded from publicity. The author's view on the point that the extension is reasonable. Parakīyā is of two kinds, Udbuddhā and Udbodhitā, the former has love by herself; the latter gets it by the inducement of the hero, both of them have love, and love is always attended by feelings of jealousy and anger, and hence Dhīrā and related varieties can appear in Parakīyā too. What the Āmoda says may perhaps be true of the Udbuddhā type of Parakīyā, but never of the Udbodhitā type. Sarcastic remark, threatening etc., characteristic of Dhīrā etc., are denied in the Parakīyā on the ground that love for her is a secret affair and the few moments of hard-won meeting rule out the possibility of any display of anger etc.; the reply is that all this can appear in privacy when the two meet secretly, the Āmoda itself creates two new varieties of Parakīyā called Patī-vañcīkā and Sāhasīkā; if such deceitfulness and daring, vañcana and sāhasa, are admissible in her, anger also is admissible. Similarly, even Sāmānyās have the varieties, Dhīrā etc., as it has been accepted that though professionals, they too have some love, and love always means anger and attendant feelings. Though these varieties are thus possible in Parakīyā and Sāmānyā, they will be illustrated here only with reference to the Svīyā.

Citing the Rasamañjarī and its definition and illustration of Madhyā-Adhīrā, the author shows that the Rasamañjarī is incorrect and that he would give more accurate definitions and illustrations of Dhīrā etc.; states that further classification of Dhīrā etc. into Khaṇḍūā etc. will be taken up later.

P 7 Definitions and illustrations (śls. 34-40) of the six varieties of Dhīrā etc. in Madhyā and Pragalbhā. Madhyā-Dhīrā: one whose anger is suggested through her speech; Madhyā-adhīrā: one who expresses her anger through an allegorical expression; Madhyā-dhīrā-adhīrā: one whose anger is partly suggested and partly expressed. Pragalbhā-dhīrā. one who shows her anger by indifference to enjoyment; Pragalbhā-adhīrā. one who exhibits her anger through threat etc., (beating and the like); Pragalbhā-dhīrā-adhīrā is partly of the former type and partly of the latter.

The classification into Jyesthā and Kanisthā; the two defined as being the object of the greater and the lesser love of the lover. Illustration (śl. 41).

Parakīyā: The Rasamañjarī-definition of the Parakīyā cited and criticised. According to the Rasamañjarī, the Parakīyā is one who is secretly in love with a person other than her wedded husband, according to the author, this is not an appropriate definition, as it is narrow and would not answer to the sub-varieties of Parakīyā called Laksitā and Kulaṭā whose love-affair is known openly to friends and others.

P. 8. The element of 'secrecy' is defended by some as being essential to the definition and explained as referring only to the husband and not to friends. Even this is wrong as this would exclude such beautiful women who are attached to other lovers and are also not abandoned by their wedded husbands. It cannot be argued that such a woman is not a regular Nāyikā, but only a Nāyikā-ābhāsa, for she is a Nāyikā in the full sense of the term by virtue of her deep attachment to her lover; only her wedded husband who also continues to cling to her is an Ābhāsa of a Patī. If the Patī-vañcīkā, she who deceives her husband and goes astray, is not an Ābhāsa of Parakīyā, but a regular Nāyikā-variety, how is the variety under discussion alone an Ābhāsa?

The definition of Parakīyā given in the Āmoda cited and elucidated. The Āmoda logically 'refines' the definition that the Parakīyā as such is one who is never the substratum of a total absence of clandestine love for a paramour, this means that, in as much as at the time of the first origin of her love for a paramour, it was secret and unknown to her husband, she is also not totally devoid of the element of secrecy; and in this manner, the Laksitā and Kulaṭā are also brought into the original definition. Even the little secrecy that is meant, the author of the Śrīngāramañjarī now points out, is not applicable to the case of the variety called Śravanānuraktā, whose love for one of whose beauty etc. she has heard is, even in the first stage, known to her friend; it cannot be held that a little secret love is necessary to make one a Parakīyā; for till this love is known, she cannot be called a Parakīyā, from something revolving in her mind alone, one cannot determine if one is a Svīyā or a Parakīyā; until something about her love for another comes out, she cannot be called a Parakīyā; therefore, the adjunct 'aprakaṭa', 'secret', is pointless.

Therefore the author's definition of Parakīyā is simply one who loves a person other than one's husband.

The omission of the adjunct 'secret' does not make the definition applicable to the Sāmānyā, common woman; for in her case there is no question of a husband or one other than him, Svīyā or Para-puruṣa.

In the case of a maiden, Kanyā, she is under her parent's control, he who is accepted by them becomes her husband; any other person is para-puruṣa; if her parents marry her eventually to the same person whom she loves, she, a Kanyā Parakīyā till then, becomes a Svīyā, this circumstance illustrated by an old verse. Nowhere else does a Parakīyā become a Svīyā.

Parakīyā is of two kinds: Kanyā and Parodhā. Kanyā defined as a maiden who is, without her parents' knowledge, in love with a lover; the Parodhā is a married lady who is in love with a lover other than her wedded husband. All the varieties of Parakīyā, other than Kanyā, are only in Parodhā. Two new varieties in Parodhā not mentioned in earlier works, Udbuddhā and Udbodhitā, dealt with by the author. Twenty-five Parakīyā-varieties shown: Parakīyā classified into Kanyā and Parodhā; Parodhā into Udbuddhā and Udbodhitā, Udbodhitā into Dhīrā, Adhīrā and Dhīrā-adhīrā; Udbuddhā into Guptā, Nīpunā and Lakṣitā, Guptā into Vṛtta-surata-gopānā, Vartīṣyamāna-surata-gopānā, and Vṛtta-vartīṣyamāna-surata-gopānā; Nīpunā into Vān-nīpunā, Kṛīyā-nīpunā, and Pativāñcanā-nīpunā, Lakṣitā into Pracchanna-lakṣitā—

P. 9. —and Prakāśa-lakṣitā; Prakāśa-lakṣitā into Kulaṭā, Muditā, Anuśayānā and Sāhasikā; Anuśayānā into Vighatita-saṅketā, Aprāptabhāvi-saṅketā and Saṅkita-saṅketā-jāra-gamanā.

Definitions of these: definition and illustration (sl. 42) of Parakīyā in general, Kanyā defined and illustrated (sl. 43); Parodhā defined and classified into Udbuddhā and Udbodhitā, illustration of Parodhā in general.

Udbodhitā defined as one in whom the lover induces the love by some means; her three varieties, Dhīrā, Adhīrā, and Dhīrā-adhīrā, Udbodhitā illustrated generally (śl 45); the varieties Dhīrā etc in Parakīyā are to be defined on the analogy of Dhīrā etc. in Pragalbhā dealt with above; illustrations of Dhīrā etc. in Parakīyā (śls 46-48).

Udbuddhā defined as one in whom love wells up of its own accord on seeing the beauty of the lover; illustration (śl 49), three varieties of Udbuddhā, Guptā, Nīpunā and Lakṣitā, Guptā defined as one who hides her love-affair; she is of three further kinds, one that hides up a love-affair that is respectively past, is to come off or has happened, and will happen again, Vṛtta, Vartisyamāna and Vṛtta-vartisyamāna Surata-gopānā.

P 10 Guptā in general illustrated (śl. 50). Definitions and illustrations (śls 51-53) of the three varieties of Guptā.

Nīpunā defined as one experienced in love-affairs with other men; she is also called Svayam-dūtī, one who has no need for other messengers to help her; she is of three kinds, adept in speech, act and deceiving her husband, Vān-nīpunā, Kṛīyā-nīpunā, and Pati-vañcanā-nīpunā, nīpunā illustrated in general (śl. 54).

P 11 Lakṣitā defined as one whose clandestine love-affair is known to a select few like her friend (sakhī); she is of two kinds Pracchanna-lakṣitā and Prakāśa-lakṣitā, illustration in general of Lakṣitā (śl 59).

Pracchanna-lakṣitā is one whose secret love-affair is inferred by her friends from certain symptoms, illustration (śl 60).

Prakāśa-lakṣitā: one whose unchastity is openly known; she falls into four classes, the harlot, the gratified, the dejected and the daring, Kulatā, Muditā, Anuśayānā and Sāhasikā; illustrations of Prakāśa-lakṣitā in general (śls. 61, 62).

Kulatā defined as one frequently seeking the company of paramours; illustration (śl. 63); Muditā defined as one gratified at the realisation of her desire for such love; illustration (śl 64).

Anuśayānā is a class admitting of many varieties; Rasamañjarī gave only three varieties, but the Āmoda showed many more; the author says that, for the sake of brevity, he would also speak only of three varieties; and adds that whereas the earlier texts do not give any names for these three varieties, he would give names to them.

P 12 Anuśayānā defined as one perturbed because of her failure to have a tryst with her paramour; she is of four kinds, one whose tryst has been broken, (Vighaṭita-saṅketā), one who is afraid that there may be no scope or facility for secret meeting (Aprāpta-bhāvi-saṅketā), one who doubts whether her paramour will go to the trysting place (Śaṅkita-saṅketa-jāra-gamanā), and one who daringly achieves her union (Sāhasikā); definitions and illustrations for Anuśayānā in general (śl. 65); definitions and illustrations of all these four classes of Anuśayānā (śls. 66-69).

Sāmānyā, the common woman, taken up; the Rasamañjarī-definition cited; according to the Rasamañjarī, the Sāmānyā is one who loves everybody for the sake solely of money; this definition is criticised: If money is mentioned as the condition, it is no love at all; further, love can be only for one; anything else will only be a semblance, Ābhāsa, and the Sāmānyā will consequently be no Nāyikā. Some would maintain the above definition, explaining love, Anurāga, as mere desire, Ichchā, which can be for several people for several reasons; this is also an absurd view, for, we are here concerned only with love as such and not some desire; the desire for mutual enjoyment between man and woman on seeing each other's beauty etc. is the love which we are dealing with here; the feeling towards relatives and friends is kinship; that towards elders or preceptors is devotion; desire is thus of many forms and if only some desire is meant, every woman will be unchaste, a Parakīyā; the true nature of love, Anurāga, will be set forth later while dealing with Rasa.

P. 13. The Āmoda is then cited; according to the author of the Āmoda, the application of the term Anurāga to the Sāmānyā in the Rasamañjarī-definition is not unjustifiable, as, for the duration of the company with a particular person, the Sāmānyā is attached only to him. To the Śṛṅgāramañjarī, even this is not an adequate definition of Anurāga; for it is something which, when it is roused for somebody, does not countenance another object at all; it can never be for many and yet be love

A shrewd objection now forseen is that such a view of Anurāga would remove from our field of study the harlot or Kulatā, who is defined and accepted as a woman attached to several men; the author replies that the Kulatā has her real love towards one whom she loves most as the best lover, and her search is all the time to find him out who will satisfy her most. The author quotes an illustrative verse on Kulatā bearing out this point from the Āmoda itself.

Similarly the Sāmānyā also is one who has her love for one person; her courting of manifold company is to maintain her trade; the author mentions here that this is the meaning of the old illustrative Telugu verse, which is evidently quoted in the Telugu Śṛṅgāramañjarī. That the Sāmānyā has no Anurāga is not true, she has it naturally but it is concealed.

Finding that the feigned attachment for many mentioned in the Rasamañjarī-definition is not proper, the author of the Āmoda gives the logical definition of Sāmānyā as one belonging to the genus Veśyātva, this is incongruous, in as much as we have been so far defining heroines by the difference in their qualities, and not by their class; if class should be taken for classification, we would have endless divisions into divine, human, divine-human (Divyā, Adivyā, Divyādivyā) and so on

The author, having discussed the condition of 'money' (vitta) in the Rasamañjarī-definition, examines now the further delimiting adjunct 'only' (vitta-mātra) citation of Āmoda's explanation of the need for the word 'mātra' (solely for money), as otherwise the definition would be too wide and apply also to the Parakīyā who seeks many paramours and receives also pecuniary consideration. This the author considers to be wrong; for in the case of a Parakīyā, the cause for her going astray is only her feeling; if any receipt of money for livelihood on her part is considered in the definition, even the chaste wedded wife would fall into the scope of that definition, as she too receives money for household expenses

Therefore, the author says that his definition of Sāmānyā is that she is one who is not married, who looks for some return and who takes to many men. Her being a Nāyikā is assured because of her inner love for one person, where her mental satisfaction alone is the return she expects; towards others, the satisfaction of love being absent and money alone being the return, the question of Rasa-ābhāsa is eliminated. Even in cases of divine Sāmānyās like Rambhā attached to Nalakūbara and others attached to other meritorious souls who have ascended to heaven, this definition is applicable, as love conditioned by a return, either of satisfaction or otherwise, is present in all those cases.

The work says that it would deal with five varieties of Sāmānyā not mentioned by other works: Svatantrā (self-dependent), Jananyadhīnā (under the mother's control), Niyamitā (engaged to one person), Kṛpitanurgā (herself devoted to a particular person), Kalpitanurāgā (one who, for her profession, feigns attachment); definitions of these. Answer to the possible objection against the Kalpitanurāgā variety as being devoid of natural love and thus not a Nāyikā, she too has her real love for somebody, and towards others exhibits an affectionate attitude for the sake of money; if she is devoid of love, how can she exhibit or affect it at all? If it is a case of real love, she is Kṛpitanurāgā; if it is feigned for money, she is Kalpitanurāgā

As love is always attended by jealousy, Sāmānyā too has the varieties Dhīrā etc.

P. 15 Kalpitanūrāgā-variety defined and illustrated

Sādhārana or general section giving a fresh classification by states of feeling of the three main classes already given, viz. Mugdhā, Madhyā and Pragalbhā, and Svīyā Parakīyā and Sāmānyā.

Disapproval of a special sub-section in the Rasamañjarī classifying Svīyā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā into three kinds each, Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, Vakrokti-garvitā, and Mānavatī.

According to the author Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā and Mānavatī would come under Khanditā, the remaining Vakrokti-garvitā alone need not be separately dealt with, adding it, therefore, the next classification of the three main types on the basis of states or Avasthās would give nine varieties: Svādhīna-patikā, Vāsaka-sajjikā, Vraholkanthitā, Vipralabdhā, Khanditā, Vakrokti-garvitā, Kalahāntarītā, Prosita-bhartṛkā and Abhisārīkā.

Svādhīna-patikā is first taken up. Citation of the Rasamañjarī-definition of this type that she is one having a husband who is always obedient, criticism of the condition sadā (always) that it should be left out in the definition; as all this classification is based on the state of feeling, the condition demanding invariability by the word 'sadā' would cut at the very root of the classification. The author's definition of her simply as one blessed with an obedient lover

Criticism of the older view that the varieties Dhīrā etc. are admissible in Svādhīna-patikā. Towards the Svādhīna-patikā, the husband is always favourable, and as such there is no occasion for anger; as a change in the mood would give rise to a different Nāyikā-type and as any misconduct of the husband would make him no longer 'favourable' (Anukūla), and consequent on his misconduct with another lady, his wife would turn a Khanditā, the offended type, Svādhīna-patikā as such would cease to exist; hence classes like Dhīrā do not exist in Svādhīna-patikā. As the illustrations of Svādhīna-patikā in older treatises overlap with Vakrokti-garvitā, the author proposes to give precise illustrations for the Svādhīna-patikā; he proposes also to add two new varieties in Svādhīna-patikā, viz. Dūtī-vañcīkā and Bhāvi-śankitā.

Definition and illustration of Svādhīna-patikā (śl. 79), eight kinds in this type: Svīyā, Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā, Sāmānyā, Dūtī-vañcīkā and Bhāvi-śankitā.

Illustration of the first, Svīyā-Svādhīna-patikā (śl. 80)

P 16 Illustration of the rest Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā varieties of Svādhīna-patikā (śls 81-85).

Dūtīvañcīkā-variety of Svādhīna-patikā defined as one who with the consent of her lover, hides her love and for fun, pretends to be offended with her lover and thus deceives her messenger (Dūtī), illustration (śl. 86), Bhāvi-śankitā is one, who, in the midst of her pleasures with her lover, feels apprehension about the future; illustration (śl. 87).

Vāsaka-sajjikā: Citation of the Pratāparudrīya-definition of Vāsaka-sajjikā that she is one who, at the approaching visit of her lover, dresses herself and arranges her pleasure-chamber for the reception. The author views that a lady the absence of whose—

P 17.—lord abroad has come to an end (Avasita-pravāsa-patikā) is also to be included in Vāsaka-sajjikā: for, according to the lexicon, Vāsaka is of six kinds and includes return from travel.

Disapproval of the inclusion of the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā in Prosita-bhartṛkā; the latter is characterised by sorrow caused by the absence of the husband abroad and the former by happiness caused by his return home. These two cannot be put together on the ground that the Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā narrates to her husband the sorrow she had been immersed in, sheds tears before him and shows herself to be one in sorrow; this is wrong, for on the arrival of her husband, it is joy that causes her tears and that she has no sorrow, but only narrates the story of her past sorrow.

Disapproval of the Āmoda's suggestion that, by virtue of the joy of the company of the husband, the Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā could be included in the Svādhīna-patīkā, the joy of the two are totally different and due to different causes, the Svādhīna-patīkā is happy because the husband does not leave her and she has no separation; the Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā is happy because her husband has returned from travel.

Definition of Vāsaka-sajjikā as one who joyously makes preparations for receiving her lover, illustration (śl. 88)

P. 18. Illustrations of Vāsaka-sajjikā in Svīyā, Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā, and Sāmānyā (śls. 89-95).

Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā defined as one who makes joyous preparations for receiving her lover who has returned from his travel; illustration (śl. 96)

P. 19. Virahotkanthitā is then taken up. Criticism of the Rasamañjarī-definition that she is one who is dejected at the failure of her lover to turn up at the promised tryst, this does not cover the case of one like Damayantī who is in a state of dejection and yearning before meeting Nala, as also the case of one who has her husband in the house itself but is unable to join him owing to preoccupation with work, definitions of this Nāyikā from the Sāhityaratnākara, Bhāratiya (Nātyaśāstra), Pratāparudriya and Nāyakabhūṣaṇa cited and criticised as overlapping with Proṣitabhartṛkā and Vipralabdhā, disapproval also of the negatively refined definition given in the Āmoda that she is one who is yearning consequent on the absence of union caused by neither travel nor cheating on the part of the lover. The author's own definition of Virahotkanthitā as one who, while being in the same place, is separated from her lover owing to some preoccupation of his.

P. 20. Older writers proposed five varieties in this type, but the author proposes to give only two, Kārya-vilambita-suratā, one whose union is delayed because of work and Anutpanna-sambhogā, one perturbed at the absence of union or one for whom the union has not taken place, in the latter, Anutpanna-sambhogā, the author gives four varieties. Darśana-anutāpitā, Śravaṇa-anutāpitā, Citra-anutāpitā, Svapna-anutāpitā, pining respectively through the sight of her lover, hearing of him, seeing him in a picture or in a dream, the author proposes to deal in this type with only varieties of Madhyā etc., as the intensity of love here precludes the Mugdhā.

Definition and illustration in general of the Virahotkanthitā (śl. 97). Definition and illustration of Kārya-vilambita-suratā (śl. 198), illustration in this class of varieties of Svīyā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā, and Sāmānyā (śls. 98-103)

P. 21. its four varieties defined and illustrated (śls. 105-109)

Vipralabdhā: Criticism of the Rasamañjarī-definition that she is one who comes to the tryst, does not find her lover there and becomes dejected, this excludes cases of Svīyā and Sāmānyā, who remain in their own homes and whom their lovers deceive. Citation of a similar definition from the Pratāparudriya, criticism of it as being too narrow; the definition in the Pratāparudriya would apply to the Nāyakavañcitā Parakīyā, not to the Sakhī-vañcitā nor to cases of Parakīyā and Sāmānyā remaining in their own places and being deceived by their lovers. The author's own definition of Vipralabdhā as one suffering in separation caused by deceit, the Amarakośa cited to support the view that deceit is the main and essential element in the Vipralabdhā-definition.

Two kinds of Vipralabhā, deceived by the hero himself (Nāyaka-vañcitā), and deceived by the lady-friend (Sakhī-vañcitā); the latter further explained as one whose lady-friend hides the lover in a corner and deceives her for fun.

P 22 Definition and illustration of Vipralabdhā in general (śl. 110), the two varieties defined and illustrated (śls 111-12); illustration in this type of varieties of Svīyā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, and Sāmānyā (śls. 113-117).

P. 23 Khaṇḍitā Criticism of the Rasamañjarī-definition as too narrow. the Rasamañjarī says that the Khaṇḍitā is one whose lover comes to her in the morning with marks of his having enjoyed another lady: it is not necessary that the lover should go to her with such marks; there is the Khaṇḍitā, who has only heard of her lover's misbehaviour and the Khaṇḍitā whom the lover has continuously ignored in his love for another.

Grammatical explanation of the name Khaṇḍitā. Khaṇḍitā means cut, shattered, the author's definition therefore is that she whose love has been cut or shattered by anger is a Khaṇḍitā, this anger in love rises in four ways.

All Nāyikās in an angry mood come under Khaṇḍitā, but when the same anger becomes Māna or silence due to anger, they come under Mānavatī, if the anger expresses itself in satirical remarks they come under the classes Dhīrā etc.; if she exhibits her anger before her friends only, in the absence of her lover, she is Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, one dejected at her lover's sport with another lady, though there is anger in the type called Kalahāntarītā too, it is a different type from Khaṇḍitā, as in the former the difference and emphasis are in the anger exhibited and in the latter, in the anger having given place to repentance.

Consideration of Māna and its nature, criticism of the older view that it is anger due to a wrong done by the lover; such non-distinction between Māna and anger (Kopa) would make Mānavatī and Khaṇḍitā identical, Māna is reticence and refraining from courtesy or response as a result of anger; acceptance of the Rasamañjarī-definition of Māna as behaviour indicative of anger, Kopa-cestā

The view of some that Khaṇḍitā has varieties Mānavatī, Dhīrā etc., their view that Māna, according to Bharata, is due to four causes, Vaimanasya, Vyalīka, Vipriya, and Manyu; the relevant verses from Bharata's Nāṭya Śāstra quoted.

The author's view that these are only causes of anger, not exactly of Māna; therefore these are to be held as the different causes of jealousy and of the condition called Khaṇḍitā.

P. 24. Khaṇḍitā defined as one having jealousy (Īrṣyā) due to any of the four above-mentioned causes Īrṣyā or jealousy defined as the mental disturbance of a lady due to her lover's friendship with another woman, it is out of this knowledge of her lover's friendship with another women that anger arises; from this anger proceed Māna and other forms of behaviour

The slight tiff arising in the midst of each other's enjoyment, called Pranaya-kalaha, is not to be included here; it will be separately dealt with in its proper place.

This Khaṇḍitā is of five kinds. Mānavatī, Dhīrā, Adhīrā, Dhīrā-adhīrā and Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, the last has a sub-variety called Īrṣyā-garvitā thus making the total varieties six.

As the love in Mugdhā is not sufficiently pronounced, there is really no Khaṇḍitā-variety in Mugdhā, but the author adds that he would illustrate varieties like Dhīrā etc. in Mugdhā too, as poetic flourishes could sometimes imaginatively show that variety also Definition and illustrations of Khaṇḍitā in general (śl. 118); illustrations in this of varieties of Svīyā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakiyā, and Sāmānyā (śls. 119-123).

P. 25 Mānavatī and Māna defined definition of Māna as reticence caused by the misbehaviour of the lover, three kinds of Māna: laghu, light, madhya, moderate; and guru strong, each defined from the point of view of their remedies; laghu-māna is that which can be removed without effort by pleasant talks, madhya-māna is that which requires for its removal much effort in the form of swearing (of faithfulness) etc., guru-māna is that which can be remedied only by very great effort in the form of prostration (of the lover at the beloved's feet) etc.

Dhīrā, Adhīrā and Dhīrādhīrā dealt with as coming under Khaṇḍitā-varieties; Dhīrā defined as one who exhibits indignation suggested through a deft (satirical) utterance, illustration (śl 133), Adhīrā defined as one who shows indignation which is very patent in her expression, two illustrations (śls 134-5) Dhīrādhīrā defined as one whose words contain both implied and express anger, illustration (śl. 136).

Mugdhā-dhīrā illustrated (śl. 137) (as a sample of varieties of Dhīrā, Adhīrā and Dhīrādhīrā among other types of Nāyikās).

P 27 Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā dealt with. The older view that showed this type only among those who were pained to see their lovers having sported with their own messengers who were sent by them to their Nāyikās. Criticism of this as too narrow a view. Sporting with another means sporting with any woman other than one's beloved, as the word 'another' itself would mean. Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā is therefore she who is pained (a) at her lover's sport with her messenger (dūti-sambhoga), (b) at his attempts at such sport with her messenger (dūti-samāsakti), and (c) at the news of her lover's sport with any other Nāyikā (itara-nāyikā-rati-śravaṇa); her sorrow at this is exhibited not before the lover, but in his absence (nāyaka-parokṣam) Thus this type falls into three kinds, Dūti-sambhoga-duḥkhitā, Dūti-samāsakti-duḥkhitā and Itara-rati-śruti-khinṇā. Also a further fourth variety is newly added viz Īrṣyā-garvitā Repetition of the definition of Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā; general illustration of the main type of that name (śl. 1. 138); definition and illustration of Dūti-sambhoga-duḥkhitā (śl. 1. 139); definition and illustration of Dūti-samāsakti-duḥkhitā (śl. 1. 140), definition and illustration of Itara-rati-śruti-khinṇā (śl 141).

Illustration of Anyā-sambhoga-duḥkhitā among the other types of Nāyikās among Svīyā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā,—

P 28—Parakīyā, and Sāmānyā (śls 142-146), Īrṣyā-garvitā defined as the jealous and haughty one who shows her anger in the absence of her lover and wants to retaliate suitably, when he calls again; illustration (śl. 147).

With this the treatment of the Khaṇḍitā is finished.

Kalahāntarītā is then taken up and defined as one who repents after having harshly turned out her lover in anger. She is of two kinds, as her tiff may be due either to jealousy (Īrṣyā-kalahāntarītā) or to a mere love-quarrel (Pranaya-kalahāntarītā). Illustration of this type in general (śl. 148).

The two defined and illustrated: Īrṣyā-kalahāntarītā is one who turns out her lover as result of his relations with another lady, and then repents; illustration (śl. 149).

Pranaya-kalahāntarītā defined as one who turns away in anger from her lover owing to his transgression of her commands, and then repents

Varieties of Kalahāntarītā in types other than Mugdhā would, it is said, be set forth. As the type called Prāya-kalahāntarītā is charming by the exceeding love that is in it, the text proposes to show its varieties in Malhyā and other classes.

Illustration in general of the Pranaya-kalahāntarītā (śl. 150)

P 29 Illustrations of Kālahāntarītā in Svīyā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā (śls. 151-155)

Vakrokti-garvitā is then dealt with defined as one who shows off her pride by her clever speech, of four kinds, proud of her love, of her beauty, of her luck in love and of her own cleverness (Prema-garvitā, Saundarya-garvitā, Saubhāgya-garvitā, Naipunya-garvitā). Of these Saundarya-garvitā is of three kinds: proud of her smile (smīta), youthfulness (yauvana), and delicate body (saukumārya), the text adds a further fourth variety to these three viz, proud of her gracefulness and blandishments (Vilāsa-garvitā).

The author of the Āmoda holds that the Saubhāgya-garvitā is not different from the Prema-garvitā, but the text holds that the two are different, in as much as Saubhāgya is not love, but the luck that endows one with (the lover's) love.

Saubhāgya-, and Naipunya Garvitās defined and illustrated (śls. 173-174)

The treatment of Vakrokti-garvitā ends with this.

Proṣita-bhartṛkā is then taken up. Consideration of the definition of this Nāyikā given in the Rasamañjarī, and the remarks thereon in the Āmoda. The Rasamañjarī defined her as one dejected as a result of the absence of her lover abroad. The author of the Āmoda pointed out here that as the word 'Proṣita' is a past passive participle, Ktānta, signifying a past action, and could not therefore refer to the present or the future, the name, Proṣitabhartṛkā, could not apply to one whose lover was just starting on his voyage and another name for her was to be coined. The Śṛṅgāra-mañjarī explains then its position with reference to this: The expression 'Proṣita-bhartṛkā' means one whose lover's voyage is in the past, present or future; all the three are comprehended in this same name. By Pāṇini 3.3.114, the Kta-pratyaya in 'Proṣitam' neuter gender, would refer to all the three times, past, present and future, 'Proṣitam' would thus mean 'Pravāsa',-voyage abroad. As in the case of bahuvrīhi-compounds like garuḍa-dhvaja, the compound Proṣita-bhartṛkā is to be split as a vyadhikarana-bahuvrīhi, meaning 'one in whose husband there is voyage'. The further grammatical points arising out of this, viz the pre-position or post-position of the ktānta, is then dealt with on the basis of Pāṇini 2.2.35 and 2.2.36.

P. 33. Further explanation of the compound and the pre-position of the word Proṣita-bhartṛkā on the basis of Pāṇini 2.2.37, explanation that according to Pāṇini 2.3.67 and 3.3.131, the Ktānta could itself comprehend all the three times, past, present and future and hence the word Prosita-bhartṛkā could mean the lady whose husband has gone, is going and will be going on journey; and as the word Bhartṛ in Prosita-bhartṛkā means both wedded husband and lover, the definition of Prosita-bhartṛkā would apply to all the three types of Nāyikās, Svīyā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā.

Or the term Prosita-bhartṛkā could be explained thus. 'Prositam' in neuter would mean Pravāsa or going on journey, and he who has that Pravāsa is a 'Prositaḥ', masculine, with 'ac' suffix denoting possessive sense, and she who has such a husband is Proṣita-bhartṛkā, the compound here being understood as a common Samānādhikarana-Bahuvrīhi-samāsa, in this explanation too, the term applies to journey in all the three times.

Illustration from a stray verse (found also in Amaruka), from Meghadūta and Sākuntala to show the use of a past passive participle in all the three times; the word Proṣita being on the same par, would similarly denote all the three times.

Citation of the definition of Prosita-bhartṛkā from the Rasamañjarī and the Pratāparudrīya, according to both of which she is one who is suffering owing to the absence of her lover abroad. Criticism that this definition would leave out cases where the lover is going or is to go on tour. So the author proposes the simple definition that she who is suffering on account of her lover's journey is Prosita-bhartṛkā, as this journey could be one in any of the three times, this definition would take in all the three cases.

Proṣita-bhartṛkā is accordingly of three kinds: she whose husband will start (Pravatsyat-patīkā), she whose husband is starting (Pravasat-patīkā) and she whose husband has gone on a journey (Prosita-patīkā). Under the last, the author adds a new variety called Sakhyanutāpitā, for in her case too, journey is the cause of distress.

P. 34. Illustration of Prosita-bhartṛkā in general (śl 175). Definition of Pravatsyat-patīkā; criticism of the Rasamañjarī-definition that she is one whose husband will leave on journey the next moment. The condition 'next moment' is found fault with, as this departure to be can as well be in a day or two. Therefore, the author offers the definition that she is one, who is afflicted on knowing her husband's preparations for departure.

Here a variety called Vigalita-prasthāna-patīkā is added by the author.

Pravatsyat-patīkā in general illustrated (śl 176), the same in Svīyā, Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā illustrated (śl 177-182).

Vigalita-prasthāna-patīkā defined as one on seeing whose distress, the lover refrains from travel.

P. 35 Illustration of the above (śl 183)

Pravasat-patīkā defined and illustrated (śl 184). The same illustrated in Svīyā,—

P. 36.—Mugdhā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā (śls, 185-189)

Definition of Proṣita-patīkā and illustration of the same in general (śl 191). Illustration of the same in Svīyā etc (śl 192-197).

Sakhyanutāpitā defined as she whom even the consoling friend (Sakhī) forsakes and goes away on journey.

P. 37. Illustration of this (śl. 198)

Thus ends the treatment of the Prosita-bhartṛkā.

Abhisārikā is then taken up; the Rasamañjarī cited as defining Abhisārikā as one who goes to a tryst to meet her lover or makes a lover meet her at an appointed place; criticism of this; it is only she who herself goes to an appointed place that can be spoken of as an Abhisārikā, quotation from Amarakośa too to this effect. Quotation from the Āmoda, which considers that the lady who brings the lover to her place, the second variety of Abhisārikā mentioned above, cannot be included in the Vāsaka-sajjikā, as, in her case there is no condition of turn, Varā-niyama, involved. The author criticises this on the basis of his own modified definition of Vāsaka-sajjikā already given (pp 16-17), the question of turn narrows down the scope and Vāsaka-sajjikā includes all such women as are eagerly making preparations on account of the expected arrival of their lovers. Therefore, it is proper that the lady who makes her lover go to her is included in Vāsaka-sajjikā.

The Rasamañjarī is thus held to be wrong, the author defines Abhisārikā as one who goes to meet her lover at a tryst. The author proposes to illustrate her in Svīyā and other classes; he gives further five sub-varieties of the Parakīyā-Abhisārikā, she who goes in moonlight (Jyotsnā-abhisārikā), in darkness (Tamo-abhisārikā), during day (Divā-abhisārikā), in pride (Garvā-abhisārikā), and in great passion Kāma-abhisārikā.

A sixth variety is also then added by the author, Prema vākya-abhisārikā, for the lady who calls on her lover and spends time conversing with him. A variety called Prema-abhisārikā has been mentioned by the author of the Rasikapriya, but it is unnecessary, for all Abhisārikās are prompted only by love.

Abhisārikā in general illustrated (śl 199), illustration of the same in Svīyā, Mugdhā (śls 200-201)—

P 38.—Madhyā, Pragalbhā and Parakīyā (śls 202-204)

Jyotsnā-abhisārikā is she who goes out in moonlight in white dress; illustrations (śl. 205-206) Tamo'bhīsārikā defined as one who goes out in darkness in black dress; illustration (śl 207).

Divābhīsārikā is one who goes out in day; illustration (śl. 208).

Garvābhīsārikā is she who meets her lover at his place, but out of pride, hides her love and says that she came on some work and engages herself in conversation; illustration (śl. 209).

P. 39. Kāma-abhisārikā is one who goes forth in great passion; illustration (śl. 210).

Prema-vākya-abhisārikā defined as one who reaches her lover and engages herself in an endearing conversation; illustration (śl 211).

Sāmānyā-abhisārikā illustrated (śl. 212) The treatment of Abhisārikā is thus finished.

With this is also finished the section setting forth the common classification (Sādharaṇa) of all the types Svīyā etc., from the point of view of their emotional condition (Avasthā)

Now is taken up the consideration of the classification of all women into the three classes, Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā. The Rasamañjarī says that the Uttamā or the higher type of woman is she who acts favourably even when her lover does wrong; the Āmoda, while commenting on this, points out that this definition of Uttamā is narrow and cannot apply to the Khanditā who is enraged at her erring lover, the Svādhīnapatikā whose husband never does any wrong, and the Kalahāntarītā who slights her lover; and therefore descriptively amplifies the definition thus: in the case of a Khanditā, the favourable attitude (Hitakārinītvā) consists of not getting too angry when the lover errs; in the case of a Kalahāntarītā, it consists of intense repentance after the slight offered in a stress of feeling; and (in the case of the Svādhīna-patikā) it is the further intensity of love expressing itself in the form of eager arrangements for enjoyment, the unfavourable attitude (Ahitakārinītvā) in the case of the Svādhīna-patikā will be the picking up of Pranaya-kalaha.

According to the author, the Uttamā is one whose favourable acts excel those of her lover; Madhyamā is just as favourable in her acts as her lover; Adhamā shows less favourable acts than her lover.

Explanation of how this classification of superior, ordinary and inferior (Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā) would apply to all the categories of Nāyikā set forth in the classifications given above.

Regarding her form which is the physical substratum of feeling (Ālambana), the Pragalbā is Uttamā, Madhyā is Madhyamā and Mugdhā is Adhamā.

In Svīyā, the Uttamā is one who is devoted firmly till death and is obedient to her lover, she is the Pativrātā, the Madhyamā is just responsive to the extent of her husband's favourable disposition, and is obedient to him by all common standards of the world, the Adhamā is the wife of varying temperament

P 40. Parakīyā Uttamā—one in absolute secrecy and for life attached to a paramour, Madhyamā—one whose unchastity is open, Adhamā—the fickle woman who seeks everybody.

Sāmānyā. Uttamā—the Kīptānurāgā who restricts herself to one, Madhyamā—the Kalpitānurāgā who is independent, Adhamā—the same who is under her mother's thumb.

Svādhīna-patīkā Uttamā—one who falls out in Pranaya-kalaha and comes round herself, Madhyamā—one who herself picks up a tiff and then herself pacifies her lover; Adhamā—one who picks up a quarrel and is looking out for the lover to pacify her.

Vāsaka-sajjikā Uttamā—one who decks herself with clothes and ornaments that would please her lover, again and again sends her friend to find him out, is looking in the direction of his coming and is immersed in the joys of the union with the lover whom she is expecting; Madhyamā—she who puts on the ornaments sent by the lover and is merely waiting for him; Adhamā—she who is just in her normal attire even after the arrival of the lover

Vīrahotkanthitā Uttamā—one whose pangs increase even at the briefest separation; Madhyamā—one whose suffering goes up to swooning when the lover is out of sight; Adhamā—one whom the separation from her lover affects slowly

Vipralabdhā. Uttamā—one who forgets the fact that the lover had let her down by becoming attached to another lady and becomes very much perturbed, Madhyamā and Adhamā are also to be similarly understood by the love and consequent dejection at the lover's deceitful conduct being less and less.

Khanditā. Uttamā—one who, while the lover's guilt is serious, is only slightly angry; Madhyamā—one whose anger is equal to the gravity of the lover's guilt, Adhamā—one whose anger is out of all proportion to her lover's guilt.

Mānavatī Uttamā—one whose Māna is slight (laghu), Madhyamā—one whose Māna is moderate (madhya), Adhamā—one whose Māna is strong (guru)

Dhīrā: Uttamā—one who offers her remarks with due regard for the lover and in such a manner as anger is hidden and finely suggested, Madhyamā—one whose words uttered with due regard are clearly suggestive of anger Adhamā—one whose speech is more expressive of anger than suggestive

Adhīrā Uttamā—one who slights her lover and speaks words which are patently angry, Madhyamā—one who threatens, Adhamā—one who resorts to beating.

Dhīrādhīrā. the acts of Dhīrā and Adhīrā get mixed here and the varieties Uttamā etc. have to be accordingly understood by the mingling of the characteristics mentioned above under Dhīrā and Adhīrā

So also the varieties Uttamā etc. are to be deduced in Anya-sambhoga-dhukhitā.

In Vakrokti-garvitā, Uttamā is she who describes the lover more than he does her; Madhyamā describes him only as much as he does her, Adhamā is she who describes only herself.

Kalahāntarītā Uttamā—one whose remorse is far more than (the anger) she had before the lover tried to pacify her; Madhyamā—one whose repentance is of the same intensity as her anger in the previous state, Adhamā—one whose remorse is less than the anger she had previously.

Prosita-bhartṛkā Uttamā—one who is upset by the mere mention of the lover's departure; Madhyamā—one whom only the actual departure affects, Adhamā—one who experiences suffering after the departure of the lover

Abhisārikā. Uttamā—one who forgets her body and goes forth with her daring as her only escort, this is the type known as Kāmābhisārikā; Madhyamā—one who goes to the tryst along with an escort; Adhamā—one who waits for the convenient time and then goes.

P. 41. Sakhī Uttamā—one who wishes most for the Nāyikā's happiness; Madhyamā—one who speaks pleasing words; Adhamā—one who speaks and helps at random.

Definition of Uttamā in general repeated; illustration of Uttamā in general (śl 213).

Uttamā in Svīyā, Madhyā, Pragalbhā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā illustrated (śls. 214-218)

Madhyā and Adhamā definitions repeated, Madhyamā and Adhamā in general illustrated (śls. 219, 220)

Thus finishes the treatment of Uttamā etc

Now to the treatment of the accomplices of the Nāyikā, like the Sakhī or friend. Though at the time of bearing a message, the Sakhī herself becomes the messenger or Dūtī, the Sakhī and Dūtī are distinct in their functions and are to be, therefore, separately defined and illustrated. The Rasamañjarī-definition of Sakhī as one who is by the lady's side, in whom the lady confides and from whom she derives relief

P. 42 To be brief the meaning is, Sakhī is one who is by one's side and is a fit person to confide in This is accepted by the author.

In the Rasamañjarī and the Āmoda the various things done by the Sakhī (Sakhī-kṛtya) are given thus: toilet, censure, coaching, making fun, eulogy, diversion, removing Māna, inculcating Māna, enquiry about her mind, consoling during separation, sport in forest and water, sport on the swing, games with dolls and balls, the games of wheeling round, blind-folding and dice, and drinking, the author adds to these the following: deceiving (for fun), circular dance, picking flowers and spring sports

Definition of Sakhī repeated; Sakhī in general illustrated (śl. 221)

Sakhī-kṛtyas, Mandana etc. Mandana defined and illustrated. (śl. 222) Censure is of two kinds, of the hero and of the heroine; both illustrated (śls. 223-224).

Similarly coaching is of two kinds; both illustrated (śls. 225-226).

Making fun is of three kinds, accordingly as it is done by the friend, the heroine or the hero;

P. 43 —the three illustrated (śls. 227, 229).

Eulogy defined and illustrated (śl. 230). Diversion illustrated (śl. 231).

Removal of Māna twofold, accordingly as it is of the heroine or the hero; both illustrated (śls. 232-233).

Inculcation of Māna illustrated (śls. 234)

Enquiry about her mind illustrated (śls. 235).

P. 44 Illustrations of consoling during separation, sporting in forest, in water and on swing, games with dolls and balls, games of wheeling and blindfolding,—

P. 45.—dice, drinking, deceit for fun, circular dance, picking flowers and spring-sport.

Thus ends the treatment of Sakhī.

Dūtī is then taken up. Dūtī is defined as one adept in going as a messenger; she is of eight kinds; servant, friend, artisan-woman, daughter of one's foster-mother, neighbour, a lady in disguise, artiste and the heroine herself. Definition of each: Dāsī is she who takes special efforts to serve; Śilpinī is one who is herself a painter or brings a painting; the Svā is the heroine herself who goes about and arranges her union.

The Āmoda adds here other accomplices like the female recluse, the little girl who is innocent of love-matters, the relative, the omen-teller, and the danseuse qualified in music and dance.

P. 46 The author says that he would add two more, the woman pedlar and the anxious one. Vikretrī is one that sells articles, and though she may be of numerous kinds, four of them are taken here as especially attractive in the context of love,—the seller of glass (-bangles), of perfume, of gems and of flowers. The Śankitā or anxious one is she who on hearing the harsh words of the lady fears that the lover may get upset and undertakes the work of nice mediation. If the recluse and the omen-reader are so by guise, they would come under the general class of Linginī or woman in disguise, similarly pedlars added by him, the author says, would also come under the same Linginī, if they are so by disguise; if however they are so by profession, and not by disguise for this purpose, they are independent varieties of the love-accomplice.

The work of the messenger comprises bringing together, conveying the suffering of separation, conveying the love, encouraging, reporting the lover's affair with another lady, bearing message, and divining the mind. Now to the definitions and illustrations of the messenger and her varieties and her activities.

Dūtī in general defined and illustrated (śl. 250). Illustrations of Dāsī, Sakhī, Kāru, Dhātreyī, Prātiveśinī, Linginī, Śilpinī (śls. 251-257).

P. 47 Svā, Yoginī Pravrajitā, Ājñāta-manmatha-vikārā Bālā, Vipraśnikā, Naṭī (śls. 258-262).

Vikretrī in general, Kāca-vikretrī, Paṭavāsa-vikretrī, Mani-vikretrī and Prasūna-vikretrī (śls. 264-267).

P. 48 Śankitā defined and illustrated (śl. 268). Activities of the Dūtī defined and illustrated: Sanghatanā or bringing about union (śl. 269)

Viraha-vedana is of two kinds,—conveying, during separation, of the news of the suffering of the lover to the lady and vice versa, illustrations (śls. 270, 271).

Conveying similarly the love of the lover to the lady and vice versa; illustrations (śls. 272, 273).

Praise of the lovers and their love illustrated (śl. 274).

Encouragement is twofold, of the lover and the lady; illustration of both (śls. 275, 276)

P. 49. Illustration of the report of the sport of the lover with another lady (śls. 277). Bearing of message of two kinds,—the lady's to the lover and vice versa; both illustrated (śls. 278-9), divining of the mind illustrated (śl. 280).

The section on the lady-messenger ends

The subject of Nāyaka or the lover is taken up; Nāyaka defined as the male who is the object of the love of the lady; Nāyaka in general illustrated (śl. 281).

Nāyaka is of three kinds, husband (Patī), paramour (Upapatī) and he who is given to the company of courtezans (Varśika). Husband defined as the lawfully wedded man, he is of six kinds, the faithful (Anukūla), the courteous (Dakṣiṇa), the adaucious (Dhrṣṭa), the rogue (Śaṭha), the touchy (Māmn), and the clever (Catura). The six kinds defined: Anukūla is one who is faithful in his love to one lady; Dakṣiṇa is one who is attached to more than one but is equally well-disposed towards all of them; Dhrṣṭa is the lover who is attached to more than one lady, and even when his offence is known and the lady repudiates him for it, continues to court her; the rogue is he who keeps his faithless conduct secret and approaches the lady as if he is innocent; the Mānin is the guilty lover whom the consequent anger of the lady puts out; the Catura is one who conveys his desire to the lady in some clever manner.

The older writers included the Mānin and the Catura in the Śatha, but the author thinks that this is improper as the first two are, by their characteristics, clearly distinct from the last. Therefore, six are the varieties of Pati; so also are the Upapati and Vaiśika of six kinds each

As Pati is superior, he is first dealt with. Definitions and illustrations of these classes now follow. Pati defined and illustrated (śl. 282). Anukūla defined and illustrated (śl. 283).

P. 50 Definition and illustration of Dakṣiṇa (śl. 284), definition of Dhr̥ṣṭa; the author adds a variety of Dhr̥ṣṭa called Dhūrta (the scamp). Illustration of Dhr̥ṣṭa (śl. 285).

Dhūrta defined as one who misbehaves with another, and ere the lady shows her anger, himself gets into an angry mood; illustration (śl. 286).

Śatha defined; two kinds of Śatha, the secret and the open, Śatha in general illustrated, the secret type of rogue is he whose guilt is known to the beloved only, illustration (śl. 288); the open type of rogue is he who goes away on seeing the lady offended and on finding her temper better, presents himself again to her; illustration (śl. 289).

Mānin defined and illustrated (śl. 290), Catura defined as one who conveys his desire cleverly through speech or action;

P. 51 the clever in speech (Vāk-catura) illustrated (śl. 291), the clever in action (Kriyā-catura) illustrated (śl. 292).

Definitions and illustrations of Upapati and Vaiśika (śls. 293, 294).

All these types of Nāyakas are classifiable into Uttama, Madhyama and Adhama, superior, middle and inferior, from another point of view: He who pacifies the offended beloved with pleasing acts is Uttama, the middle type is he who shows neither anger nor love when she is offended, and by silently bearing her temper, watches her mind, the inferior type is one who has neither shame nor compassion, and is particular about having sexual union. For fear of length, the author proposes to omit further definitions and illustrations of these

From another point of view, these lovers are of three kinds: Proṣṭa, one who has gone on journey and is consequently separated from his beloved; Amulīta, one who is yet to be united with the object of his love and is yearning for her, and Vrahm, one who is near, but owing to other work, is unable to join his beloved; each of these three defined and illustrated (śls. 295, 296, 297).

Now to the accomplices of the Nāyaka,—Pithamarda etc. Pithamardā is one who is good at bringing round an offended lady; Vitā is a master of all arts and branches of learning; Ceta is one who brings about the meeting; Vidūṣaka is a clown. Illustrations avoided owing to fear of length.

Thus ends the treatment of Nāyaka.

The Sāttvika-bhāvas which show the mutual love of the lovers are now taken up. The Rasamañjarī quoted with approval on the eight Sāttvikabhāvas, Sveda, perspiration; Stambha, limbs getting benumbed; Romāñca, bristling of the hair; Svaraḍhaṅga, breaking of the voice; Vepathu, tremour of limbs; Vaivarnya, loss of colour; Āśru, tears; Pralaya unconsciousness.

P. 52 Definition and illustration of these (śl. 298).

Śṛṅgāra Rasa dealt with: Quotation with approval of the author of the Rasamañjarī on the definition of Śṛṅgāra. Śṛṅgāra is that which develops from the permanent mood (Sthāyi-bhāva) called Rati or love.

This love is between a man and woman and vice versa. Its causes, Kāraṇas, are the beloved and the lover who form the mutual objects of love, Ālambana vibhāvas, and the exciting conditions, Uddīpana vibhāvas, spring, southern breeze, sandal etc.; these, the two Vibhāvas, are respectively the causes of the manifestation and further increase of love. Glances and movements of brows are ensuants, Anubhāvas, they are the results, Kāryas. Bashfulness (Lajjā), etc are transitory feelings, Vyabhicārī-bhāvas, they are accessories, Sahakārins. Śṛṅgāra, which is of the form of pleasure (Sukha) and longing (Utkanthā), called respectively union (Sambhoga) and separation (Vipralambha), is the attainment of the state of relish or Rasa, in which everything else has dropped out of consciousness, and which is brought about by the sum total of the above-mentioned conditions augmenting the permanent mood of love (Ratī-sthāyi-bhāva).

This Śṛṅgāra is of two kinds, worldly and non-worldly (laukika and alaukika), the worldly Śṛṅgāra is the love between the hero and the heroine, the non-worldly Śṛṅgāra manifests itself in the reader or spectator through the poem or the drama. Explanation of these two by the talk and dalliance that the hero and heroine indulge in, there is a joy which only the hero and heroine derive; the Rasa that they thus have is purely of a worldly nature (laukika), on the other hand, by reading a poem or witnessing a play, through the poetic expression or the dramatic action, the glances, the disporting of the limbs and such other acts and the feelings like bashfulness come to be relished by the readers or spectators, and thereby there is a bliss that manifests itself in them; this is the non-worldly (alaukika) Rasa which pertains only to the audience. Reference to the author of the Rasamañjarī as expounding this view.

The citation of the view of older writers that Rasa is non-worldly, alaukika, and manifests itself only in the audience; that it is the permanent mood nourished by the Vibhāvas, Anubhāvas and Vyabhicārībhāvas, which being presented either through a beautiful poem or by accomplished actors, are contemplated upon by the audience, relished and brought to the stage of ineffable bliss.

Definition of a Sthāyi-bhāva quoted and explained; a Sthāyi-bhāva explained with reference to love, a permanent mood is that which is not overcome either by a similar mood or by a dissimilar mood and continues upto its attaining the state of Rasa; in love towards a particular lady, a similar mood is love towards another, a dissimilar mood is, for instance, loathsomeness (Bībhatsa), the permanent mood of love is neither put down nor hindered by either of these two.

Such a steadfast mood is love (Anurāga). Definition of Anurāga, love: in separation, it produces suffering, and in union, it gives no rise to the desire for enjoying anything else. The cause for such love is really Providence, not the qualities of beauty etc. For, a charming man is devoted to a woman devoid of charms, and a man of parts to a worthless woman, and vice versa, when such is the experience which cannot be set aside, it is clear that love is a providential blessing, beauty and other endowments are useful only to augment this love.

P 53 This love is of three kinds: intense, ordinary and inferior, Uttama, Madhyama and Adhama. Uttama-anurāga is that which develops intensely and in separation produces the ten stages, and produces the constant thought of the beloved person; illustration of this (śls. 299). Madhyama-anurāga produces suffering in separation, and in union, mental comfort. Adhama-anurāga produces only slight suffering during separation, and after union, as days pass, brings on forgetfulness.

From the point of view of the initial circumstance from which it originates, this love is again of four kinds: respectively through Śravaṇa, Darśana, Citra and Svapna, hearing, seeing, seeing one in a picture and seeing one in a dream. The first is produced by listening to the report of one's beauty and other qualities; the second, by seeing one actually; the third by seeing a lover in a picture, and the fourth by seeing a lover in a dream.

Though union and separation are of the form of happiness and longing, older writers had stated that union is embrace and the like, and separation, the desire for the coming union, Sambhoga and Vipralambha dealt with accordingly, illustrations of Sambhoga (śls. 300, 301), and Vipralambha (śls. 302).

P. 54. Illustrations of the four kinds of love through hearing etc. (śls. 303-306)

Thus far, the author says, he dealt with the different types of Nāyikās, from the point of view of their various states and acts (cestā-viśesa), following the Rasamañjarī; but now he proposes to deal with a classification of heroines and heroes from the point of view of their physical and mental dispositions, (Gunas), types of ladies Śāṅkhinī etc. and of men, Bhadra etc., following Vātsyāyana. As, however, the qualities of the male-types, Bhadra, Datta, Kucaṁvāra and Pāñcālā are not different from those of the female-types Hastinī, Citrinī, Śāṅkhinī and Padminī, separate illustrations for the former are not given. In the types Hastinī etc., further mixed classes are also found by the admixture in one type of some characteristics of another, in such mixed types, whichever is the element pertaining to the superior type, that produces for the time being, joy through its contemplation; at other times, joy is to be derived from fondling and the like indulged in by the lovers. The same is the case of mixed types among Nāyakas. As the ancients have elaborated this topic, the author proposes to be brief.

Illustration of a woman in whom the qualities of all the four classes Hastinī etc. are found (śls. 307)

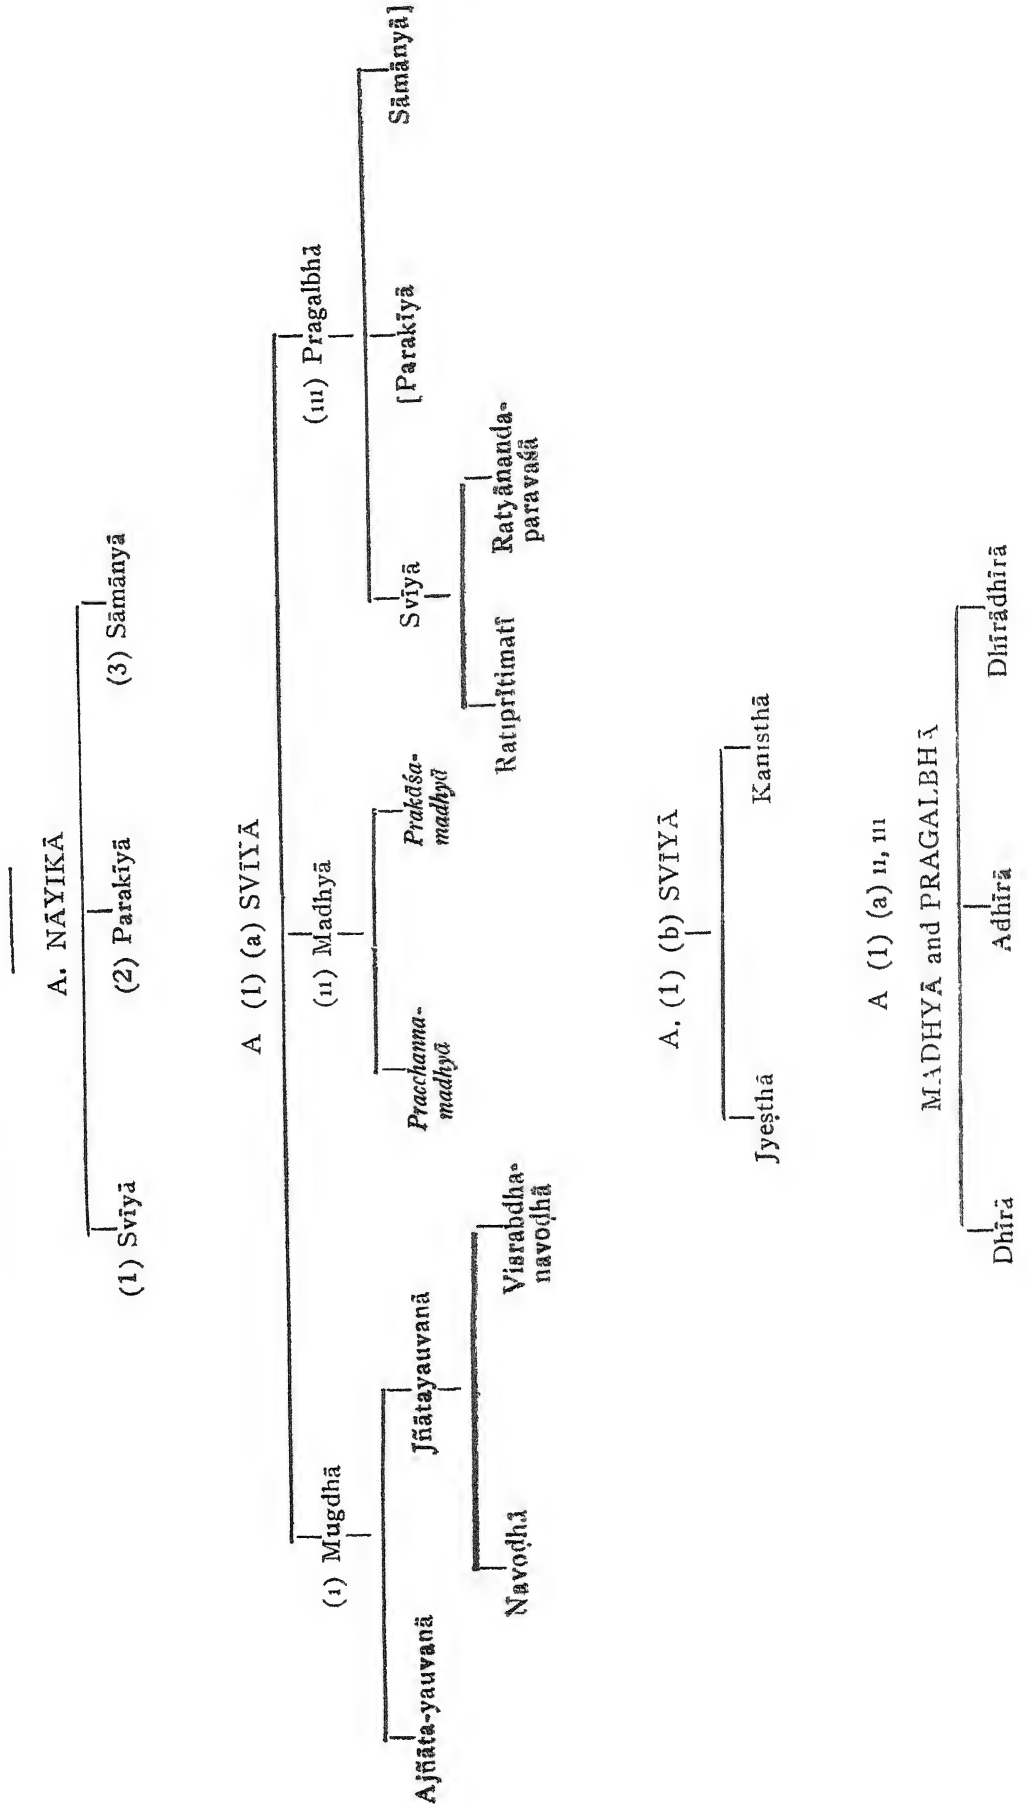

Illustrations of Hastinī, Citrinī and Śāṅkhinī (śls. 308-310)

1 को विष्णुः is the ms reading here. As the verse proposes to give for the name A Kavaia the etymology that Akbar is superior (Vara) to Visnu ' \ ' and Brahmā (Ka), (आकाश काच वरः), I suggest here the reading ओ विष्णुः. 'Akāra' refers to Visnu 2 M य missing.
 3 M. सह 4. M नामाख्यम् wrongly The reading suggested नामभ्याम् refers to his two names, Akbar and Bade Saheb. By Akbar, his superiority to Visnu and Brahmā, & his being Siva, is once suggested, by Bade Saheb meaning 'Great lord',—Mahā-Īśvara-tva is again suggested.

*See Adyar Ms Amoda. Amoda also holds this same view that the Patisambhoga of the Parakīyā is to keep appearances पतिसम्भोगादेः प्रवृत्तिस्तु तस्याः पत्युः प्रत्ययदर्शनार्था । P 34 But the difference between Amoda and Sr mañjarī is that the latter would not call this Anurāga, and thus would avoid the need for the word ‘Eva’ in the Svīyā-definition

§ The Amoda explains that the Rasamañjarī definition also comes to this in effect: तथा च लज्जाविजितमन्मथत्वं लक्षणार्थः P 45, Adyar Ms.

* This is quoted in Āmoda, Adyar Ms, p 368

§ See Āmoda, Adyar Ms, p 441 The Āmoda does not itself propose this variety of Avasita--pravāsa-patikā The discussion occurs later under the ninth variety called Pravatsyat-patikā proposed by some and discussed in the Rasamañjarī after dealing with the eight varieties. Here the Āmoda points out that the author of a work on this subject, Vilāsaratnākara, does not accept the Pravatsyat-patikā, as, according to that writer, a similar variety, the tenth, called Avasita-pravāsa-patikā, will have to be accepted then, it is in reply to this that the Āmoda suggests that the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā could easily be included in the Svādhīnapatikā Really the Āmodakāra is of the view that it is best to abide by the old eightfold classification, as such further distinctions will land us in endless ramification

* This satirically refers to the signs on his face of having remained with another lady.

† This again asks him to have a look at his own face, eloquent about his misbehaviour with another

‡ The verse is spoken by an offended lady to her misbehaving lover; she asks him to go to that lady who is pining for him that night like the female cakravāka and if she too happens to be offended and relentless, owing to his not being faithful to her too, to go away from her too, somewhere else, in his usual heartless manner

 The drift of this verse also is somewhat obscure the offended lady satirically tells the erring lover It is but proper that on the moon of your face, in the lip, there is the mark (lāñchana) (of another's union) and there is no such mark (lāñchana) in the moon-digits on your body viz the curved nail-prints (caused by that lady)¹ (While the lāñchana on the face (lip) is a tooth-print, on the body, the nail-prints themselves are the lāñchanas.)

§ On Dhīrā etc being illustrated in Mugdhā too see above p. 7 The first line is spoken by the Mugdhā Dhīrā who says, on seeing her lover's lip bearing the bite of another lady, that a bee stings his lip, mistaking it for the red bandhūka flower, and applying to himself and herself the same remark of a bee coming upon the lip, the lover, with a smile, hastens to kiss her Compare Rasamañjarī, verse 44, Mugdhā-Khanditā illustration.

INTRODUCTION

P. 9, line 7 from bottom, P. 11, Para 5. Pratāparudriya-citations. There are on the whole five citations from Vidyānātha's Pratāparudrayaśobhūṣaṇa made in the Śṛṅgāramañjarī; the two other citations are (i) on p. 3 where the Śṛṅgāramañjarī quotes and criticises Vidyānātha's definition of the Mugdhā (I. 55) and (ii) on p. 33 where it quotes and criticises his definition of the Proṣita-bhartṛkā.

P. 14, Para 3. Bhānudatta's Alankāratilaka. This text has since appeared in print, having been edited by Dr. G. V. Devasthali in the Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, N. S., Vols. 23, 24-25, 1947-1949.

P. 16, lines 16ff., P. 25, lines 17-19, Bharata's classification of women in terms of gods, demigods, animals, birds, etc. Another work which devotes some detailed attention to this classification is the Mānasollāsa (A.D. 1131) of Someśvara, Gaek. edn. Vol. II. pp. 150-153. Towards the very end of the work again, in the sections on love sports and enjoyment, Someśvara adverts to these varieties. (Ms. in BOR. Institute.).

P. 19, Para 2. P. 20, Para 4. p. 77, line 8. Text Pp. 12-13:—

Veśyā and real love

The question of the Sāmānyā Nāyikā having real love has been touched upon by writers. Our text rightly argues here that though professionally responsive to many for money, she has her own real love for some one. However, it is usual to define Sāmānyā or Veśyā as a Nāyikā whose love is called forth by money. The Śṛṅgāramañjarī criticises that such a definition would knock the bottom out of the very conception of a Nāyikā and make the Veśyā a Nāyikābhāsa. Therefore it has to be granted that she has real love for somebody, though elsewhere, towards many, she has to be professionally engaged. The Kāmasūtras no doubt speak of the courtesan's greater concern for money—I. ii. 15, 17. अथेस्तु राज्ञो (गरीयान्) । वेद्यायाश्च । but later in the section devoted to this Nāyikā, the Vaiśika, Vātsyāyana says that love is natural to her and activity caused by money is only artificial. VI. i. 1— वेद्यानां पुरुषाधिगमे रतिः वृत्तिश्च सर्गात् । रतितः प्रवर्तनं स्वाभाविकं, कृत्रिममर्थार्थम् ।

In IV. i. 54 and VI. ii. 1, Vātsyāyana speaks also of the devoted courtesan attached to a single lover, a type illustrated by characters like Vasantasenā, whom texts on dramaturgy classify as the variety called Raktā. Bharata too accepts such a variety when he speaks of the Madanātūrā Veśyā. See Intro. above p. 17. The Śṛṅgāratilaka says, exactly, as the Śṛṅgāramañjarī puts it later, that if she is defined, as is done by some, as devoted solely to money, hers will become a case of Śṛṅgārābhāsa, and that really speaking she too has genuine love. P 26, Para 2 Vāgbhata's separation of Kanyā from Parakīyā, and mention of the main types as four. It is interesting to note in this connection that an anonymous writer whom the Āmoda cites (p 31) and criticises holds Kanyā as a variety independent of Parakīyā, and further separates similarly the Svarinī also from the Parakīyā, giving thus five main Nāyikās.

P 28, Para 2, lines 9-11 Regarding Sāmarāja's reference to and criticism of writers who apply the Pracchanna-Prakāśa classification to all, it may be noted that the Hindi Rasikapriya applies it to every variety.

P 29, lines 21-3. Kanyā-illustration Regarding Viśveśvara's illustration of the Kanyā by the unchaste girl who marries and continues her love for the paramour, the verse cited by Viśveśvara is given in the Āmoda also as an illustration of the Kanyā-variety called by the Āmodakāra, the Ārabdhā-vivāha (p 223).

Especially lines 3, 4 from bottom on p. 33 and fn. on pp. 33, 34 Regarding my observation on the name Hastinī occurring in both these classifications, it is interesting to note that this has led Someśvara to identify the two Hastinīs, combine the two sets and give a consolidated group of six varieties, Mrgī, Padmīni, Citrinī, Baḍavā, Hastinī and Citrinī See Mānasollāsa, Gaek. edn. Vol II pp. 145-153

P 34, Footnote, lines 12-15, Ratīśāstra. A sixth edition of this work with Sanskrit text and English translation was issued in 1921, by Abinash Chandra Ghose, B.A., through Sarat Chandra Seal, 14, Lakshmi Dutt Lane, Baghbazar, Calcutta

P 36, line 1, Date of Candrarāja. According to the Karnātakakavīcarite, the date is 1079 A.D.

P 47, lines 26-30 Sāmarāja's inclusion of Svayamdūtī in Vāgvidagdhā. The Āmoda says (p. 174) पुंश्चलीभावे पण्डिता विदग्धा, एषैव स्वयंदूतीत्युच्यते ।

See also Text P. 10, line 14, Śrngāramañjarī, where the Nipunā is called Svayamdūtī. The Āmoda and the Śrngāramañjarī are more correct in identifying the Svayamdūtī with the Nipunā or Vīdagdhā in general, rather than with one of her varieties, the Vāgvidagdhā.

P. 49, last line. On the view that the Pithamarda has nothing to do with Śrngāra, see also Sāmarāja, Śrngārāmrtalaharī, p. 140 (1938 Reprint).

P 55, lines 21-22, the Gāthāsaptasatī and the Śrngāramañjarī: For another telling instance where an illustrative verse in the Śrngāramañjarī happens to be an adaptation of a verse in the Saptasatī, see Śrngāramañjarī text, p. 7, verse 35, अन्यत्र गमितरात्रे etc., which is a recast of Gāthā VII 53, anyāpadeśa salutation to Sūrya by a Khanditā.

Nāyaka-Nāyikās in poems and plays

An important work to be noticed here before the Āryāsaptasatī of Govardhana is the Gitagovinda of his famous contemporary Jayadeva

The colophons here to cantos five to ten say that they are devoted respectively to the following Nāyikā-varieties: Abhisārikā, Vāsakasajjā, Vipralabdhā, Khanditā, Kalahāntarītā and Mānini

As Kumbhakarna points out, canto 1 beginning with the song lalitalavanga etc. depicts the Virahotkanthitā in the person of Rādhā. In canto 2, the same condition of Virahotkanthitā continues for Rādhā, and she speaks to her friend with a touch of jealousy towards others with whom Kṛṣṇa is sporting, the text itself says in the final line of the second song here उत्कण्ठितगोपवधूकथितम् । In Canto 4, Rādhā is still Virahotkanthitā

By the nature of the theme and the Nāyaka, the two Nāyikā-types Svādhīnapatikā and Prositapatikā fall out of the scope of the work

Regarding the other Gopīs with whom Kṛṣṇa is sporting, they are Abhisārikās.

Regarding the Nāyaka, Kṛṣṇa, he is mainly Dakṣiṇa, but occasionally Śaṭha, Dhṛṣṭa and Dhūrta also (see Kumbhakarna's gloss on foot 8 of the song candanacarcita in canto 1)

In imitation of Jayadeva, Rūpagosvāmin also illustrates the eight Avasthā-Nāyikās in his songs on Kṛṣṇa and Gopīs See Stavamālā, Kāvya-mālā 84, pp. 270-279.

The Hindi work Rasikapriya of Keśavadās

Thanks to my friend Śrī Rāi Bahadur S N Chaturvedi of Lucknow, I could procure a copy of this work. It is a treatise on Rasa in 16 chs. In ch. 2, it speaks of Nāyaka, Anukūla, Dakṣiṇa Śaṭha, and Dhṛṣṭa, each divided into two kinds Prakāśa and Pracchanna. In fact, the Pracchanna-Prakāśa classification is applied to every variety in this work.

In ch. 3 the treatment of Nāyikās begins First is given the four classes Padmīnī, Citrīnī, Śankhīnī and Hastīnī

Then Svakīyā divided into Mugdhā, Madhyā and Praudhā, each having four-sub-classes

Mugdhā—Navavadhū, Navayauvanabhūsitā, Navānangā and Lajjāprāyaraṭi.

Madhyā—Ārūdhayauvanā, Pragalbhavacanā, Prādurbhūṭamanobhavā, and Surata-vicitrā. Then Dhīrā etc. for Madhyā.

Praudhā—Samastarasakovidā, Vicitravibhramā, Ākramitanāyakā and Labdhāyati. Then Dhīrā etc. for Praudhā.

Parakīyā—Ūdhā and Anūdhā.

Ch 4. Darśana—Sāksāt, Citra and Svapna. Then Śravana. Both Darśana and Śravana divided into Pracchanna and Prakāśa

Then Keśavadās deals with the cestās or various acts of Nāyakas and Nāyikās in love.

Ch 8 takes up the eight Nāyikās Svādhīnapatikā, Utkā, Vāsakasajjikā, Abhisandhitā, Khanditā, Prositapatikā, Vipralabdhā and Abhisārikā. Each of these is divided into Prakāśa and Pracchanna Under Abhisārikā are given, besides Svakīyā, Parakīyā and Sāmānyā, the varieties Premābhisārikā which our text Śrngāramañjarī refers to and refutes (p. 37, text), Garvābhisārikā, and Kāmābhisārikā.

Then are given the three classes Uttamā, Madhyamā and Adhamā.

Ch. 11 deals with Sakhi.

P. 3, line 8 and P 12, last line. Regarding the true nature of love, which the text says here, will be dealt with later in the section on Rasa, see end of the text, p. 52, last 5 lines.

P. 6, last two lines. Etāsām dhīrādīnām agre lekhanīya itī etc.

For this treatment given later, see text below pp. 23-28

P 13, line 11 Divyā, Advyā etc. The classification of heroines by what is termed 'Jāti', classes of beings, ie, into divine, human and divine-human beings, Divyā, Advyā, and Divyādivyā illustrated for example by Indrānī, Mālātī and Sītā, is not recognised by the Śrīngāramañjarī. On this it follows the Rasamañjarī, see pp 106-7, Chowk edn

P 16-17 also Intro P 78, lines 24-25 —

Vāsaka

In connection with the Nāyikā-variety called Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā which some propose under Proṣita-patīkā owing to the whole theme of 'going on journey' (pravāsa) being one unit, comprising all phases from the Nāyaka about to leave up to his return, the Śrīngāramañjarī opines that as the situation of the Avasita-pravāsa-patīkā is such that the heroine in it is joyous and is preparing for the reception and union, it should really be included in the Vāsakasajjikā

Here the Śrīngāramañjarī examines the meaning and scope of Vāsaka in the name Vāsakasajjikā and cites a lexicon, quoted originally in the Āmoda, according to which Vāsaka is sixfold; Vāra or turn, Rtu-kāla or proper mating season, Pravāsād āgata-kriyā or return of lover from travel, Rustaprasādāna or lover pacifying the offended beloved, Nāyikā-utsava or the heroine's rejoicing and Navodhā-abhyupapatti or the inducing and enthusing of the newly wedded bride

Of these six, the first, Vāra, turn, seems to have been the earliest meaning, and as the turn might also be dependent on Rtu, the meaning of the word Vāsaka must have gradually extended till it came to embrace all situations in which a Nāyikā is found joyously expecting her lover and preparing herself for receiving him. According to Kāmasūtras IV 11. 80—and the Jayamangalā on these वासक्रमः, वासक क्रमप्राप्तम् and वासकः परिपाट्या शयनम्, turn seems to be its original sense. Even in later times, Vāsaka was primarily associated with Vāra-niyama or turn. Under the Vāsakasajjikā-definition itself, the Rasamañjarī says वासको वारः (p 154), and again, while explaining why the Pravatsyat-patīkā cannot be brought under the Vāsakasajjikā, the Rasamañjarī says 'vāra-niyama-abhāvāt' (p. 185). Extension of the meaning of Vāsaka is already seen in Bharata. In XXII. 196, the Nāṭyaśāstra says that women should be approached according to either Vāsaka or Rtu; and immediately before this, the Nāṭyaśāstra has two verses (Kasī edn. XXIV. 200-3) mentioning Vāsopacāra and six kinds of Vāsaka.

वासकपाल्यस्तु यस्या वासकः * * * वासकं च निवेदयेयुः । and V. vi. 4—यस्यां तु प्रीतिर्वासकः ऋतुर्वा * * *

वासोपचारो यश्चैव स रात्रौ परिकीर्तितः ।

परिपाट्या फलार्थे वा न च प्रमद एव च ।

दुःखे चैव प्रमादे च षडेते वासकाः स्मृताः ॥

Again verse 219 (K. M., Kasī 225) makes reference to the timid or angry beloved as requiring the processing of Vāsaka. According to the commentary of Abhinavagupta, the verse Paripāṭyā etc. should read thus:

ADDITIONAL NOTES

परिपाठ्या फलार्थे वा नवे प्रसव एव च ।

दुःखे चैव प्रमोदे च षडेते वासकाः स्मृताः ॥

Paripāṭi is the well-known turn, Phalārtha is taken by Abhinavagupta, and justifiably too (cf. Jayamangalā V v1 4—ऋतुरपत्यार्थम्), as Rtu, the third 'Nave' is interpreted as 'Navatve', and refers probably to the fresh entrant into the king's harem; 'Prasave' the fourth, is interpreted as referring to that inmate of the harem who has been, for some time, mother of a recently delivered child and is longing for a visit from the king, the fifth and the sixth are Duḥkha and Pramoda, some occurrence of misery or joy for the lady in her parents' or relatives' house when it is but proper for the king to call on her and console or felicitate her (cf. Jayamangalā also, on IV. 11 80—यस्याश्चातीतो, व्यसन-उत्सवाभ्यामन्तरितः ।) Etymologically also, Abhinavagupta explains Vāsaka as derived from the lover living that night with the lady concerned परिपाटी यथाकल्पितानुपूर्वी अस्या एकदिनवारः, अस्या द्वाभ्यामित्यादि । तदपवादमाह फलार्थ इति । ऋताविति यावत् । नव इति नवत्वे । प्रसवे वृत्ते चिरविरहखिन्नां सुखयितुम् । दुःखं तदीयव्यावर्त्यादौ (व्यापत्त्यादौ ?) दुःखिता आश्वासनीयेति । प्रमोद इति तदीयपुत्रोत्सवादौ । उत्सवो हि माननीय इत्युक्तम् । वासयति तत्र स्थाने रात्रमिति ॥ Abhinavabhārati, Madras Ms 2785 Vol III P. 58.

Here we see included the Vāra, Rtu, Navodhābhyupapatti and Nāyikā-utsava mentioned in the lexicon quoted in the Śrngāramañjarī, we have also here Prasādana or pacification, but while the later lexicon would make it refer to an angry beloved, in Bhārata and Abhinavagupta it is consoling one in grief.* Thus the only element which is absolutely new in the definition of Vāsaka given in the lexicon quoted is 'Pravāsād āgata-kriyā', 'return of lover from abroad and attendant circumstances', which is also, unfortunately, the crux of the discussion whether the Avasita-pravāsa-patikā is to be included in the Vāsaka-sajjikā or not.

Māna-apānodana-upāyas.

See also Intro p. 21 para 1 end, p. 23, lines 1, 2

On the many ways of removing the Māna of the lady, see Śrngāratilaka, p. 138, śls. 42-3, six ways of removing Māna,—Sāma, Dāna, Bheda, Upeksā, Pranatī, Prasanga-dhvamsa or Rasāntara (sudden change of situation) as the Daśarūpaka (p 130) puts it. For Bhoja's great elaboration of this topic, see my Bhoja's Śrngāra Prakāśa, Vol. I p 59.

In the Bhāna Dhūrta-vita-samvāda (Caturbhānī edn, pp. 16-17), there is a regular discussion on the relative efficacy of the different means of removing Māna, Īśvara-datta criticises Pādapatana, Śapatha and Hāsa (a variety of Rasāntara) and advocates another variety of Rasāntara viz sudden and forcible kissing of the lady (Avamrdaya cumbana), an effective means already illustrated in a verse in Hāla's Saptasatī, V. 65.

P 39, Kāmābhisārikā See p 40, last line. The Kāmābhisārikā is considered the Uttama-Abhisārikā.

* In a well-known illustrative verse cited frequently for the Dakṣiṇa-Nāyaka, the reasons requiring the King's visit are given as Rtu (स्नाता तिष्ठति कुन्तलेश्वरसुता), Turn (वारोऽङ्गराजस्वसुः) pacification (देवी प्रसाद्या च) and a night won as wager in a game of dice (यूते रात्रिरिय जिता कमलया); the first three are already mentioned above, the fourth, a special case, is new.

P 45, line 22. Dāsī. The text defining Dāsī as 'Yatna-sevikā Dāsī' is not quite happy or expressive; what it appears to mean is that, as one in paid service, she is to take special efforts to carry out the task entrusted to her

P 46, lines 6-7. Dūtī-vyāpāras. In the enumeration of the messenger's acts and functions here, there is omission of Praśamsā or praising the lovers which ought to occur after Anurāga-nivedana; see below p. 48 in the illustration-portion where it is found, see also above p. 43 where it is included in the similar set of functions of the Sakhī or friend

P 49, line 21 Inclusion of Māñī and Catura Nāyakas in Śatha by the previous writers The reference is to the Rasamañjarī, p 219

P. 52, lines 16—17 Rasa On Rasa the Śrngāramañjarī says that according to the author of the Rasamañjarī, Rasa is twofold, Laukika and Alaukika, pertaining to the Nāyaka-Nāyikā and pertaining to the audience. It should not be taken that this is a reference to the text of the Rasamañjarī, it refers to ch. 6 of the same author Bhānudatta's Rasataranginī where this subject is touched upon

P 52, line 22. The verse 'Sajāñyāk' on Sthāyibhāva and the footnote on it that it is quoted, wrongly, as from the Daśarūpaka, in the Pratāparudrayaśobhūṣana.

The Āmoda also quotes it on p 589 as from the Daśarūpaka

P. 53, Four kinds of love. See also p 21 and Intro p 21 Para 1, lines 14ff. The Śrngāramañjarī speaks of love as of four kinds according as it is generated by seeing directly the object of love, hearing of the same and seeing the same either in a picture or dream. These varieties are spoken of in most works on poetics and dramaturgy, the main classification into Darśana and Śravaṇa going to Bharata himself. (Ch XXIV 148. Kasi edn) All the four varieties found in our text are mentioned by Rudra Bhaṭṭa himself; see Śr Tilaka, I. 50, 51, where Darśana and Śravaṇa are first given and then Darśana classified into Sākṣād, Citre and Svapne. These three kinds of Darśana or seeing, the Rasamañjarī mentions and illustrates at the end (pp 245-6).
